PREFACE.

THE printed documents and books concerning the Darien Company and the relations to it of its projector William Paterson, while numerous, are widely scattered, and in the following pages an endeavour has been made for the first time to focus their chief information in narrative form.

The story of the flotation of the ill-starred Darien Company, its multiplied disasters, and its tragic collapse, along with that of the chequered career of its projector, forms an interesting episode in Scottish history which should not be allowed to sink into oblivion.

Among the numerous authorities consulted and drawn upon, the following may be particularly named :—

A HISTORY OF WILLIAM PATERSON AND THE DARIEN COMPANY.

CHAPTER I.

WILLIAM PATERSON AND THE PASSING OF THE DARIEN COMPANY'S ACT.

THE material available for a narrative of the early life of William Paterson, the founder of the Bank of England and projector of the ill-fated Darien Company, is very limited. It is only after he reaches manhood that we possess details of his career. For long the whereabouts of his birthplace remained in doubt; and as regards the place of his burial, "no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." Hill Burton, the historian, as well as Saxe Bannister, Paterson's sympathetic biographer, had both to confess ignorance on these points. On the authority of William Pagan ('Birthplace and Parentage of William Paterson'), we now know that Paterson was of Scottish birth, his father having been John Paterson, farmer in Skipmyre, in the parish of Tinwald, Dumfriesshire. The farmhouse where he was born (presumably in 1658) was pulled down in 1864.

Of Paterson's early education, also, little is known; but from his ready pen, and the able manner in which he expressed himself in his numerous writings, it may justly be inferred that the superior elementary education provided by the parish school of his day laid the foundation of his future intellectual attainments.

Eliot Warburton, in 'Darien, or the Merchant Prince,' informs us that he saw it stated in an old pamphlet in the Bodleian Library that Paterson, when about seventeen years of age, on account of being suspected of intercommuning with certain Covenanters who were sheltering in his neighbourhood, was forced to leave his home in Dumfriesshire and take refuge in Bristol with an aged kinswoman of his mother. This lady dying shortly afterwards, it is conjectured that he then left England for Amsterdam, and in his visits to the coffee-houses there he became acquainted with several of the leading merchants of that town. From this Dutch port he is believed to have made his first voyage to the West Indies, where he spent some years. It has been stated that he became first a missionary, and afterwards a buccaneer, but this is unsupported by any reliable evidence. The latter suggestion—that he attached himself to the Brethren of the Coast—is one which is quite at variance with Paterson's high-toned life. It may have had its origin in the circumstance that, while resident in Jamaica, it is understood that he got acquainted with the two well-known buccaneers, William Dampier and Lionel Wafer, from whom he derived much of his information respecting Central America and the Spanish Main. The probability is that, while in the West Indies, Paterson was engaged wholly in mercantile pursuits.

After acquiring a moderate fortune and considerable business experience, he returned to Europe with a Scheme of Foreign Trade which he had matured, the result of long study of questions of commerce and finance, and which he hoped to carry into execution under the auspices of some foreign Power. With this in view, about the year 1686 he visited several Continental towns, when he took occasion to offer his Scheme to Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg, and to the cities of Emden and Bremen; but meeting with little encouragement, he returned to England and settled down in London as a merchant.

Putting his Scheme of Trade aside for a time, Paterson, along with his friend Michael Godfrey and a few other London merchants, brought forward another important project, with which his name has ever since been honourably associated. This was his proposal for the formation of a National Bank, first submitted to the Government in 1691, and which finally led to the establishment of the Bank of England in 1694. Paterson's claims as "chief projector" of that great institution have never been seriously questioned. He was one of the original directors of the Bank,¹ and he saw it fairly started; but owing to a difference of opinion with the majority of his colleagues, when he was outvoted, he voluntarily withdrew from the Corporation in 1695 by selling out his qualification of £2000 stock. In a petition to Queen Anne some years afterwards (dated Westminster, 4th April 1709), he says—

"Your Petitioner first formed and proposed the scheme for relieving the public credit by establishing the Bank of England; but that, notwithstanding the signal success of that institution for the public service, and his unwearied endeavours in promoting the same through all manner of opposition from 1691 to the full establishment thereof in 1694, your Petitioner never had any recompense for his great pains and expense therein."

Paterson's career now turned in the direction of Scotland and the Darien Company.

With the Revolution of 1688, the religious and political troubles of Scotland had begun to subside and a spirit of trade and adventure had arisen in their place. The people were envious of England's lucrative colonial trade, and longed to enjoy similar economic advantages. This desire for commercial expansion was accentuated by a succession of bad harvests, which had reduced many thousands of the population to destitution. In order to remedy this unfortunate state of matters and give effect to the commercial aspirations of the nation, the Scottish Parliament devoted itself to passing several Acts fitted to stimulate home industries and foreign trade. Notably, on 14th June 1693, it passed an important measure, entitled an Act for Encouraging Foreign Trade, wherein it was declared that Scottish companies might be formed to trade “with any country not at war with their majesties—to the East and West Indies, the Straits and Mediterranean, Africa and the northern parts”; and such companies were promised Letters Patent and the Great Seal.

The passing of this wide trading Act paved the way for the Parliamentary incorporation of Paterson’s great scheme, the Darien Company, which came about in this wise.

The monopoly of Indian trade, enjoyed by the London East India Company, had long been encroached upon by “interlopers,” or ships sent out by private traders, a number of which were owned by Scots merchants in London. These gentlemen hoped to have a free trade to India, or to obtain a Charter for a rival Company. They were disappointed in this, as the old Company not only frustrated their efforts in that direction, but also secured a renewal of their own Charter for other twenty-one years. This was the position of affairs when the session of the Scottish Parliament was opened on 9th May 1695. King William expressed his regret that important engagements abroad prevented him from meeting with them, but he sent the Marquis of Tweeddale down to Scotland as his Commissioner, with instructions to gratify the ancient kingdom as far as possible. In his opening address, after the king's letter had been read, Tweeddale, among other assurances of the royal regard for Scotland, informed the House that "If they found it would tend to the advancement of trade that an Act be passed for the encouragement of such as should acquire and establish a plantation in Africa or America, or any other part of the world where plantations might lawfully be acquired, his Majesty was willing to declare that he would grant to his subjects in Scotland, in favour of their plantations, such rights and privileges as he was accustomed to grant to the subjects of his other dominions."¹

In the same month, May 1695, Paterson was approached by his friend Mr James Chiesly, merchant in London, who acquainted him that there was great encouragement given by the Scottish Legislature for establishing an East India Company in Scotland on a legal basis, and he asked his assistance in the matter. In response to Chiesly's request, Paterson drew up and handed to him the draft constitution of a Bill for erecting such a Company. The draft Bill, whatever Paterson's private prepossessions may have been at the time, while giving significant prominence to an American as well as to an African and Indian trade, did not otherwise, on the face of it, suggest the Darien enterprise, with which it was ultimately solely associated. Its original and ostensible design was the establishment of an East India trade. The measure as drafted by Paterson, having been approved by his mercantile friends in London, was carried into Scotland by Mr Chiesly and Mr Coutts, who were favourably received by the chief officers of State and, it may be said, by the whole of the nobility and people of any consequence. There was therefore no fear of the passage of the proposed Act, more especially as it had the patronage of Ministers of the Crown such as the Marquis of Tweeddale and James Johnston, Secretary of State, the latter of whom got the main credit of carrying it through Parliament.

Accordingly, on 12th June 1695, the Bill was presented to the Scottish Parliament for preliminary consideration, and after being read was referred to the Committee of Trade. On Friday the 21st the Bill was brought in from the Committee for further consideration, when it was again read, amended, and approved. Thereafter it was again remitted to the Committee of Trade, in order that the names of the patentees or promoters—of whom ten resided in Scotland and ten in England—might be inserted. On the Wednesday following—a fortnight after its introduction—the Bill was reported to the House, when it was “read, voted, and approved.” Thus the great Act erecting The Company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies,¹ so full of important issues for Scotland, passed the Scottish Parliament on 26th June 1695. It also became law on the same day by being carried to the Throne, where it was “touched with the Sceptre” by his Majesty’s Commissioner in the usual way.

Although Paterson was responsible for the main part of the text of the Bill, and his name appears in it as heading the promoters resident in England, he personally had no hand in its receiving the imprimatur of the Scottish Parliament. When giving evidence in January 1696 before the Committee of the House of Commons, which was appointed to examine "what methods were taken for obtaining the Act of Parliament passed in Scotland for the establishing of the East India Company, and who were the promoters and advisers thereof," Paterson stated that "he did not solicit for the Act, nor knew anything of its passing, but he heard Mr Chiesly and Mr Blackwood say that they had solicited for such an Act formerly. He was induced to be concerned in the matter, because there was no encouragement for such a trade in England."

Among the large powers conferred upon the Darien Company by their Act were the following :—

1. Monopoly in Scotland of trade with Asia, Africa, or America for 31 years.
2. Goods imported by the Company during the space of 21 years to be duty free, except foreign sugar and tobacco.
3. The Company to be empowered for the space of 10 years to equip, fit out, and navigate their own or hired ships in warlike or other manner, as they shall think fit.

4. Members and servants of the Company to be privileged against impressment and arrest; and if any of them happened to be so treated, the Company were authorised to release them, and to demand the assistance both of the civil and military powers for that purpose.
5. The Company and their officers and members to be free from taxes for 21 years.
6. No part of the capital stock or of the real or personal property of the Company to be liable to any manner of confiscation or arrest; and creditors of members of the Company to have lien over their profits only, without having any further rights over the debtors' stock.
7. The Company authorised to take possession of uninhabited territories in any part of Asia, Africa, or America, or in any other place, by consent of the inhabitants, provided it was not possessed by any European sovereign; and there to plant colonies, build towns and forts; to impose taxes and provide such places with magazines, arms, &c.; to wage war and make reprisals, and to conclude treaties of peace and commerce.

8. Should any foreign State injure the Company, the king to interpose, and at the public charge obtain reparation for the damage done.
9. All persons concerned in the Company, together with those who might settle in or inhabit any of their plantations, to be declared free citizens of Scotland, and to have the privileges thereof.
10. Letters Patent, confirming the Company's Act, to be given by the king, to which the Great Seal was to be affixed.
11. In token of allegiance, the Company to pay yearly to his Majesty and his successors a hogshead of tobacco in name of blench-duty, if required.

CHAPTER II.

THE CAPITAL OF THE DARIEN COMPANY.

UNLIKE the Act of the Bank of Scotland, passed about three weeks later, the Act constituting the Darien Company did not limit the amount of capital to be raised for carrying on the undertaking. It merely spoke in general terms of "the fund or capital stock that shall be agreed to be advanced and employed by the said undertakers and their co-partners." It was stipulated, however, that the amount of capital which might ultimately be agreed upon was to be subscribed not later than the 1st day of August 1696; that at least half was to be set aside for Scotsmen resident in the kingdom; and that the shares originally so subscribed could be transferred only to other Scotsmen similarly resident there. Failing half the stock being quite taken up by resident Scotsmen, then Scotsmen living abroad and foreigners were to be allowed to subscribe for the residue. No one could hold less stock than £100 nor more than £3000 sterling.

At first Paterson and his associates proposed to fix the total capital at £360,000, but ultimately the amount was raised to £600,000 sterling—one half, as stated, to be reserved for Scotland, and the remaining £300,000 to be offered in London. From his previous experience of the remarkable success which had attended the subscriptions of the Bank of England, Paterson anticipated little difficulty in raising the moiety assigned to London. He therefore addressed himself to quickening the speculative interest of his countrymen in the proposed enterprise, and in this connection it is interesting to read the correspondence which passed between Paterson and the Right Honourable Sir Robert Chiesly, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, who represented the Scottish portion of Directors appointed by the Act. Paterson's letters are dated from London, and in the correspondence he stands out as a financial expert far ahead of his time—being, in fact, quite abreast of the astute company promoters of our own day. In his letter of 4th July 1695 he suggests that the information about to be furnished to the people of Scotland should not be too detailed. “And for Reasons, we ought to give none but that it is a Fund for the African and Indian Company. For if we are not able to raise the Fund by our Reputation, we shall hardly do it by our Reasons." This method of floating a company on the reputation of the promoters is in keeping with some of the prospectuses of the numerous bubble companies launched a few years afterwards (in 1720), one of which stated that the company about to be promoted was "for an object to be hereafter revealed."

On the 9th July Paterson urges that a limited time only should be allowed to the public for giving in their subscriptions. He writes: "The Bank of England had but six weeks' time from the opening of the books, and was finished in nine days, and in all subscriptions here it's always limited to a short day. For if a thing go not on with the first heat, the raising of a Fund seldom or never succeeds, the multitude being commonly led more by example than reason." Continuing, he says: "They" (the gentlemen promoters in London) "hope, all things considered, that this, as it's designed, is one of the most beneficial and best grounded pieces of trade at this day in Christendom, and we must engage some of the best heads and purses for trade in Europe therein, or we can never do it as it ought to be."

Paterson several times complained of Lord Provost Chiesly's delay in forwarding to him an authentic copy of the Company's Act "as it passed the Seals," his aim being to get the Company established before the English Parliament met. On the 6th of August he writes somewhat warmly: "The life of all commerce depends upon a punctual correspondence, and we shall not fail at any time to return our thoughts upon your demands, so we hope you will keep up to the exactness of correspondence on your part." A week later Paterson intimated to the Lord Provost that it was proposed to convene a General Meeting of the Corporation, to be held in London, for the purpose of making the arrangements necessary for opening the subscriptions there. At the same time he drew attention to two errors that had crept into the Act—viz., Mr James Smith, merchant, London, being misnamed John Smith, and Mr Joseph Cohen D'Azevedo's name being printed as if it represented two separate individuals. It would therefore be necessary—in fact, it was urgent—that three from among the Scotch promoters named in the Act should be present at the proposed meeting in London, so as to make a majority and quorum, and have the errors referred to rectified. Paterson had to repeat this request several times; and in compliance therewith, although somewhat tardily, Lord

Belhaven, with Mr Robert Blackwood and Mr James Balfour, proceeded as a deputation to London and attended several meetings there, commencing on 9th November. The London subscription book was opened on 13th November 1695, and was closed on the 22nd—the day on which the English Parliament met. Thus in nine days the entire issue of £300,000 stock was subscribed, of which one-fourth—£75,000—was paid up at the time of subscription. In point of fact, the stock was over-applied for, and the applications had to be cut down. Included in the list of subscribers was Paterson's own name for £3000, and that of his servitor for £100 stock. The English promoters proceeded to business at once, not waiting until the Scotch subscriptions were taken. One of their first deeds was to pass a resolution that the Court of Directors, besides those named in the Act of Parliament, should be increased by thirty additional Directors—making fifty in all. The qualification for each of these additional Directors was fixed at £1000 stock or more, along with proxies from other proprietors amounting to £20,000, including the new Director's own holding. Under this rule several new Directors got seats on the London board during the month of November. On 4th December they passed a resolution—"That one or more ships be fitted out for the East Indies from Scotland with all convenient speed." This resolution, however, was not given effect to, as it was ultimately thought better to delay sending out ships until the Scottish subscriptions were taken.

But the progress of the Company soon sustained a check. The powerful London East India Company took alarm, and they petitioned the House of Commons, setting forth the encroachment in their Indian trade. This resulted in the Lords and Commons holding a joint conference and unanimously concurring in an Address to the King, complaining of the establishment of the Scots East India Company with privileges which it was apprehended would ruin the English East India trade, and animadverting upon the action of the Scottish Minister and the Scottish Parliament in passing the Act. The Act of the Scottish Parliament, however, could neither be recalled nor suspended. On 17th December 1695 both Houses waited on King William at Kensington with their Address, to which his Majesty made the memorable reply—"That he had been ill-served in Scotland, but he hoped some remedies might be found to prevent the inconveniences which might arise from the Act"; and followed this up by dismissing the Lord High Commissioner Tweeddale and Secretary Johnston. The Commons went further. They ordered production of the London books of the Company, made a searching inquiry into its actings, and finally threatened Paterson and his English colleagues, along with Lord Belhaven¹ and the other two Scotch deputies, with an impeachment, which, however, was afterwards abandoned. The ground of the impeachment was that the Directors were guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour in raising monies and administering an oath de fidei in England under colour of a Scottish Act of Parliament.

The House of Lords, on their part, also took extreme steps. On the 20th December they resolved to prepare a Bill to provide remedies against the inconveniences attending the Scots Act, two of the heads of which were—(1) That the subjects of England be discouraged, under severe penalties, from engaging in the stock or management of the Scots East India Company;

¹ When the summons citing Lord Belhaven to appear at the bar of the Commons was served, "the messenger was informed at my Lord's house that his Lordship was gone to Scotland."

Roderick Mackenzie, the Secretary of the Company, having refused to give certain evidence, the House ordered him to be taken into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Mackenzie eluded the search officers, and a Government proclamation was issued for his apprehension; but he also fled the country and escaped the storm.

and (2) that all seamen of England, Ireland, or the Plantations be prohibited, under severe penalties, from navigating or serving in the Company's merchant ships, and that the shipwrights and builders of ships in or belonging to England, Ireland, or the Plantations be likewise restrained, under severe penalties, from repairing to Scotland, or from building any ships for their service within those Kingdoms or the Plantations.

This hostile action on the part of the Government alarmed the English subscribers, and they reluctantly withdrew their subscriptions, and so relinquished the design.¹ The scheme, so far as regards an East Indian trade, was now knocked on the head. It has been alleged that Paterson all along had been lukewarm to the East India trade, and instead secretly hoped to carry out his long-cherished idea of establishing a great settlement in Central America.

In a letter (Bannister's 'Life of William Paterson') dated 5th September 1696, from Mr Robert Douglas, a Scots merchant in London, he says—

"I found Mr Paterson in several particulars opposing everything that tended to promote the Scots East India trade, when under consideration in England, and industriously bringing in some that were concerned in the English East India Company (five of whom had taken oaths to the said Company—were then in Committee) to be Directors of the Scots East India trade. So I considered he must be treacherous to the interest he seemed to espouse, . . . or else, knowing his ignorance in the East India trade, might have some West India design of his own to promote."

This allegation, as to assuming as Directors certain proprietors who were also members of the London Company, is partly confirmed by the evidence given by Colonel Robert Lancashire, one of the newly assumed Directors, in his examination before the Committee of the House of Commons in January 1696.

"Mr Lancashire, being examined, said that he was a member of the English East India Company, and of the Scotch East India Company, and subscribed £3000 to the stock, and gave a note for one-fourth part to Mr Foulis and Mr Chiesly, dated 8th November. That it was proposed to send out a ship as an interloper, but he refused to consent to it, saying it was against his oath to the English East India Company."

Meantime, prior to the subscription books being opened in Scotland, care had been taken to arouse the interest of the Scots nation in the proposed foreign trade by the circulation of pamphlets on the subject. One of these bore the title, 'Proposals for a Fond to cary on a Plantation,' which stated that "persons of all ranks, yea, the body of the nation, are longing to have a plantation in America." This probably was inspired by Paterson. The "Address" of the two Houses to the Crown, which directed special attention to the ample privileges conferred by the Scottish Act, but without the king's damaging reply to it, was also printed and reprinted at Edinburgh, and being widely circulated, had much influence in moving public opinion in favour of the scheme.

The withdrawal of the London subscribers,—men experienced in large commercial undertakings,—and the pronounced hostility of the English Government, should have made Paterson and the Directors in Scotland hesitate before proceeding further in the affair. But the insult attending the opposition of the English Government, and the disavowal of the project by the king, wounded the honest pride of the Scots, who patriotically resolved "to stand upon their own bottom," and to pursue the undertaking, although on different lines, with their own resources. They aimed now at a capital increased to £400,000,¹ in place of £300,000.

On the 26th February 1696, within a few weeks after the denunciation of the English Parliament, the subscription book of the Darien Company was opened in Edinburgh. The scheme immediately became a national concern, and people of all classes pressed forward to participate in the emission. In his 'History of England,' Macaulay says: "From the Pentland Firth to the Solway, every one who had a hundred pounds was impatient to put down his name."²

On the first day, 26th February, £50,400 was subscribed, and daily, till the end of March, the list filled up steadily. The last two days of March brought in considerable support. On the 30th, Mr Thomas Scott, merchant, Dundee, came as a deputy from that town with 42 subscriptions besides his own. On the 31st, a large contingent came forward. To meet the pressure that day the subscription book was kept open in the afternoon, and 176 applications in all were received. A separate book was opened at Glasgow on the 5th of March, and the total amount received there was £56,325. At a General Meeting of the Company held on 3rd April—Lord Belhaven in the chair—it was reported that upwards of £300,000 had been subscribed. By the end of May the capital of £400,000 was all taken up excepting £25,000. In June and July the applications dropped away, and several days frequently passed without an entry. The list was kept open until 1st August, the last day fixed by the Company's Act, when the grand total of £400,000 was completed.¹ This result, however, was accomplished with some difficulty, as the books of the Company reveal the fact that on the closing day certain subscribers, by arrangement with the Company, temporarily increased their original applications, so as to enable the Directors to make the announcement that the total issue had been taken up.

² The Lord Justice-Clerk, writing to Lord Tullibardine on 18th December 1697, says: "'Twas the notice the Parliament of England first took of it [Darien Company] made the whole nation throng in to have some share, and I'm of opinion the resentments people are acted by are the greatest supplies that furnishes life to that affair."

The names of the various subscribers—all “residents in Scotland”—are noteworthy.¹ They comprise nobles, landed gentry, merchants, ministers, surgeons, lawyers, &c., including all the royal burghs of Scotland.² Paterson’s scheme appealed strongly to the ladies of Scotland, the first five names put down on the list being—

The “Good Town of Edinburgh” (per Lord Provost Chiesly) took the maximum subscription of £3000, and the Merchant Company of Edinburgh took £1200, while the little “Town of Queensferry” went in for £100 stock. On the closing day the "Royal Burghs," as a body, ventured £3000, and the last to sign the list was "Sir Archibald Mure, in name of the burgh of Cowpper of Fyfe," for £100 stock.

42$\frac{1}{2}$				per cent in all.

Note.—The first call of 25 per cent was to bear interest from 1st August 1698, and the remaining calls from their respective dates of payment.

The first instalment of 25 per cent was well met. It should have produced £100,000, and it actually realised the sum of £98,223, 17s. 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. In connection with this call, the Directors offered a discount of 12 per cent on prepayments, whereby they drew in the sum of £34,006, 13s. 4d. before the due date, 1st June. This proved to be bad business, as the Company, in their assumed rôle of bankers, commenced shortly afterwards to lend money to their proprietors at the modified rate of 4 per cent. They had to make this concession in competing with the Bank of Scotland, whose directors at this time had reduced the interest on loans from 6 per cent — the legal rate — to 4 per cent.

As mentioned above, the various calls made by the Directors amounted in all to 42½ per cent of the total capital of £400,000 subscribed, and this should have realised £170,000. The actual cash paid up by the subscribers in respect of calls was £153,448, 5s. 4¾d., along with £65,646, 3s. 2¾d. of overdue interest. This large amount of interest indicates the great difficulty experienced by the subscribers in meeting their calls. In the extraordinary national enthusiasm evoked at the time, the Scottish people subscribed for much more stock than they were able to pay calls upon. In the final years of the Company, subscribers all over the country had to be sued at law for payment of their calls, and when the Company was dissolved in 1707 a considerable balance then still due by the proprietors had to be cancelled.

The call-money paid up, together with the interest, amounted in all to £219,094, 8s. 7¾d., and this sum represented the grand total which Scotland stood to lose in the ill-fated concern.

CHAPTER III.

THE DARIEN COMPANY AND ITS BANK-NOTE ISSUE.

ONE of the first operations resolved upon by the Court of Directors of the Darien Company was the organising of a banking business as an adjunct to their great colonisation scheme. This was in defiance of the Act passed in favour of the Bank of Scotland on 17th July 1695, whereby that institution had a monopoly of banking in Scotland. The Bank Act declared that, for the space of twenty-one years after its date, "it shall not be leisom [lawful] to any other persons to enter into or set up an distinct Company of Bank within the Kingdom."

The Act of the Darien Company contained no reference to banking, being solely directed to foreign trade and commerce. It appears, however, that Paterson had it in view from the first to include banking, or a "fund of credit" as he termed it, as part of his scheme. This intention was kept secret at first; but it got "air" about the month of May 1696, while Mr John Holland of London, the founder and first governor of the Bank of Scotland, was temporarily residing in Edinburgh. Holland had come to Scotland at the request of the directors of the Bank for the purpose of placing the young institution on a proper business footing, as he was thought to be better acquainted with the nature and management of a bank. Holland felt keenly the unexpected and hostile attitude of the Darien Company, and he made a spirited attack on Paterson in a pamphlet published in Edinburgh in 1696. This brochure is entitled 'A short Discourse on the present Temper of the Nation with respect to the Indian and African Company and of the Bank of Scotland; also of Mr Paterson's pretended Fund of Credit.' In this paper Holland stated that, on his arrival in Edinburgh, Paterson came "and begged him to pardon his ever pretending against the Bank, and [declaring] that whatever had been [done] was only for fear it might interrupt and hinder the subscriptions to the African Company, but he [Paterson] saw it did not, and therefore wished all manner of success to it.”¹ Notwithstanding this protestation, Paterson and his associates proceeded with their banking operations.

The following establishment was appointed, apparently with a view to engaging in banking on an extensive scale :—

¹ Paterson had no hand in the formation of the Bank of Scotland, but was rather opposed to it. In a letter to Lord Provost Chiesly, dated London, 15th August 1695, he says, “I desire a copy of the Bank Act so surreptitiously gained. It may be a great prejudice [to our Company], but is never likely to be any matter of good to us, nor to those who have it.”

² The first official staff of the Bank of Scotland, like its

On 18th June 1696 an engraved copperplate for printing bank notes was given in charge by the Court of Directors to their Committee of Treasury, "to be kept under lock and key with the cash." The committee were also ordered to take care "that no copies or blank bills should be cast off or printed, but in presence of three at least of their number; who were further directed to take all such blanks into their special care, as if the same were real money."

A writer in the 'Scottish Antiquary' of July 1896 states that the character of the lettering on the copperplate is so close a copy of Paterson's handwriting that it may be assumed that the original paid-up capital of £10,000, was on a modest scale. For the year ending March 1697, the entire charge for salaries and directors' fees was £452, viz. :—

original model of it passed to the engraver direct from his own pen. A similar reference is made to the handwriting filling up the blank spaces, dates of issue and money amounts, &c., of the actual notes in process of being made ready for circulation.¹ The notes were of the values of £100, £50, £20, £10, and £5. The same copperplate was used for all the denominations of the notes, the different values being written in with the hand.

Following upon this—viz., on 26th June—the Court of Directors, having under consideration “the manner of rendering the Company’s Current-Bills useful,” ordered that fit persons should be appointed at Glasgow, Dundee, Aberdeen, &c., to be cashiers to the Company, who should have certain amounts of the Company’s bills in their hands, to answer and serve the Company’s correspondence in these towns and the several next adjacent places. Accordingly, the cashiers of the Company in the various parts were charged with the Company’s bank notes, for the purposes of circulation, as follows:—

Owing to the poverty of Scotland at this period, the practice of receiving money on deposit had not begun, and banking clients were all borrowers.¹ Strict banking consisted in lending money on heritable and personal bonds and in the discount of bills. By this means the Bank notes were placed in the hands of the public.

As we have seen, the Darien Company opened agencies in various provincial towns for the purpose of circulating their notes. This infringement of the Bank's special Act of Parliament and obstruction to its progress at the beginning of its career was very trying to the young institution. In a letter written in 1696 by the London directors of the Bank to their colleague Mr Holland in Edinburgh, they say that they "are sorry to hear of any designs of the African Company against us [i.e., the Bank], having resolved to assist them in the best of our power, they containing themselves within the bounds of their Act." Although the Bank directors possessed the exclusive privilege of banking in Scotland, they did not exercise their right of contesting their legal position, and so extinguishing the innovation on their monopoly. The Darien Company was too popular throughout Scotland, "the whole humour of the nation being run on it," to render any action of this kind a success. The Earl of Marchmont, writing to the Duke of Queensberry in December 1699, says: "I have enough ado to keep myself from falling into disgrace with that Company, which is little less than to say falling into disgrace with the Scots nation." Mr Holland noted this, and prudently advised his fellow-directors "to lie by for a little, and so manage the Bank's affairs as not to suffer an affront from the mighty Company by the latter making a run upon their cash." As it happened, the obstruction was temporary only, and in a year or two it entirely disappeared.

Lawson, in his 'History of Banking,' states that in order to obtain a circulation of their notes, and to suppress the notes of their rival the young Bank, the Company lent money on securities which they were unable to realise,—"this coming to the knowledge of the public, lessened the value of their stock so much that they ultimately gave up the banking business." The Company also made advances to their own proprietors on the security of their stock—a practice which had to be discontinued.¹ Probably the chief cause of their non-success in banking was the fact that the whole of their paid-up capital, with borrowed money in addition, was fully required in exploiting their great colonisation scheme. The want of "till-money" endangered the convertibility of their notes. As Paterson himself states in a tract, published in 1705, "No bank can succeed without a considerable fund of cash to answer necessary demands."

When the notes were finally retired by the Company on 19th June 1701, the total issue had amounted to £12,085 only, thus—

¹ By way of contrast, we give the Bank of Scotland note circulation at the time. In his 'Short Discourse' (1696) Mr Holland says: "As soon as the rules and methods for carrying on the Bank of Scotland were agreed to by the General Meeting of Adventurers, the Directors proceeded to business, and with such success that the credit of the Bills [Bank notes], as fast as they were issued out, obtained to a degree beyond expectation." The Bank took in its subscriptions and commenced business some months earlier than the Darien Company, and their first issue of large notes is dated 25th March 1696, being three months prior to those of the Darien Company. £1 notes were not issued by the Bank until 7th April 1704. In December 1704, when the Bank made a temporary stop, caused by the scarcity of money all over the kingdom and by a report that the Privy Council was to cry up the value of "species," the balance-sheet, drawn up for the information of the Council, reported that the Bank notes outstanding amounted to £50,847. This was after the Bank had met a severe run:

CHAPTER IV.

THE COMPANY'S PREPARATIONS FOR THE FIRST EXPEDITION TO DARIEN.

WHEN the London subscribers reluctantly cancelled their subscriptions, owing to the threatened impeachment and other hostile acts of the English Government, five of their number held out, resolving to stand to their guns. Three of these gentlemen—viz., Paterson, James Smyth, and Daniel Lodge—visited Edinburgh for the purpose of giving their best help to the Scottish Directors in floating the Company in Scotland.¹ Mr John Holland, the London merchant, in his 'Short Discourse,' states—

"When I came down to Scotland, which was on the 18th of March [1696], I found Mr Paterson very popular, and in some proportion Mr Smyth and Mr Lodge ; and I found the whole nation universally in favour of the Indian and African trade."

After a short stay Smyth returned to London, but Paterson and Lodge remained in Edinburgh and attended several committee meetings of the Company. As Paterson was the only Director intimately conversant with the methods of foreign trade, he figures as the chief spokesman and counsellor at these meetings ; and as his services were no longer required in England, he now placed all his information and valuable experience at the disposal of the Scottish Directors.

At an important meeting of the Committee of Foreign Trade, held on 23rd July 1696, Paterson submitted several memoirs, journals, reckonings, illuminated maps, and other papers of discovery, in connection with which he proposed sundry designs and schemes of trade. The meeting also came to some resolutions as to "ships, cargoes, stores, and equipages needful for Africa and the East and West Indies." The members of the committee appear to have been impressed with the feasibility and advantage to the Company of the designs proposed by Paterson. They unanimously requested him to commit his designs to writing, and deliver them in a sealed packet, together with the relative journals, maps, &c., to the Secretary for the Company's use. The packet was to be further sealed with the respective seals of my Lord Ruthven and three other Directors, and was not to be opened but by special order of the Court of Directors.

At this meeting the project of the great Darien scheme appears to have been unfolded and discussed for the first time, and Paterson was "encouraged freely to bestow all his pains and time henceforward in prosecuting the undertaking." The design was communicated to a select few of the Directors, upon whom strict secrecy was enjoined.¹

The scheme as propounded by Paterson was a magnificent one, and one which has fascinated other projectors since his day, who have emulated his project at enormous cost,—also without success.² For many years it had been Paterson's dream, and had much engaged his thoughts, that a certain part of the Isthmus of Darien, in

² When De Lesseps' Panama Canal Company went into liquidation in January 1889, its bond and share indebtedness and interest charges were roughly estimated at £74,000,000, with perhaps a fifth of the real work done.—'Chambers's Encyclopædia': article "Panama."

Central America, should be made an entrepôt for the exchange of Western and Eastern commodities. At commodious ports on each side of the Isthmus he proposed to establish emporiums, and to conduct the trade of the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, collected at these points, across the Isthmus by an overland route. By reason of its geographical position, it was anticipated that over this highway two-thirds at least of the commerce between Europe and Asia would be diverted from the route round the Cape, and Scotland might thus supplant Holland as the great mart for the wealth of the East. Paterson himself described the advantages of the proposed new route in the following words :—

“The time and expense of navigation to China, Japan, the Spice Islands, and the far greatest part of the East Indies will be lessened more than half, and the consumption of European commodities and manufactories will soon be more than doubled. Trade will increase trade, and money will beget money, and the trading world shall need no more to want work for their hands, but will rather want hands for their work. Thus, this door of the seas, and the key of the universe, with anything of a sort of reasonable management, will of course enable its proprietors to give laws to both oceans, and to become arbitrators of the commercial world, without being liable to the fatigues, expenses, and dangers, or contracting the guilt and blood, of Alexander and Cæsar.”

The inauguration of universal free trade and the concentration of the commerce of the globe on the Isthmus of Darien were the dominant ideas of Paterson's scheme; but when he lost influence with the Company, as will be afterwards explained, the free trade idea was departed from, and, instead, it was resolved to settle a plantation or colony on the north side of the Isthmus, to be called by the name of "Caledonia."

On the 22nd August the Company, at a meeting, at which Paterson and Lodge were both present, instructed John Munro, Doctor of Medicine, along with other four "Chirurgion-Apothecaries" in Edinburgh, to prepare sufficient medicaments for the use of 1500 men for two years. On 30th September the doctor was further ordered to proceed to Dundee, Montrose, Aberdeen, and other northern towns, to ascertain the cheapest price of beef, and also dry and barrelled cod-fish, for the Company's use. He was also instructed to employ gunsmiths "wherever he can find them," and set them to work to make as many pistols "as they'll undertake" at 17s. or 18s. per pair.

Right on to 1697 the Company continued to purchase and amass a vast quantity of provisions and articles of trade, which they stored in their warehouse in Miln Square, Edinburgh. Large purchases were made of arms and ammunition and general ironmongery, also smiths', coopers', and carpenters' tools.

The following list gives an indication of the various stores which were collected :—

- 300 tons biscuit (coarse, middle, and fine).
- 200 oxen ("the best they can find, to be slaughtered at Leith").
- 70 tons stalled beef.
- 15 tons pork.
- 7½ tons suet.
- 20 tuns vinegar ("the best").
- 20 tuns brandy.
- 7 tuns rorum ("half black, half yellow").
- 5 tuns claret ("strong").
- 20 tons prunes.
- 29 barrels tobacco pipes.
- 2000 reams paper ("sortable").

The Company also closed with the widow of Andrew Anderson, printer, for "a bargain of Bibles and Catechisms," for which £50 sterling was paid in advance. A contract was also entered into with Jeromie Robertson, periwig-maker, for "Campaign Wigs and Bobb Wigs"; and three Edinburgh hatters delivered into the Company's warehouse 1440 hats, at 2s. each, as the first instalment of their contract.¹

The Directors had appointed two agents to go "beyond the seas" (Alexander Stevenson to Hamburg, and Thomas Gibson to Amsterdam) to get the necessary ships built for the Company's use. Shortly after this, towards the end of September 1696, Paterson and other two Directors were deputed to visit these places to secure additional marine stores, and pay for the ships and arrange for their transference to Scotland. At that time such stores could be obtained much cheaper in Holland than in Scotland. There were also no dockyards in Scotland where ships could be built, and England was forbidden to give the Company any help in regard to seamen or shipping.

Owing to his familiarity with the home and foreign Exchanges, Paterson was selected as the Director fittest to handle the funds required to defray the cost of shipbuilding and other charges abroad. The sum of £25,000 was therefore entrusted to him, and of this amount, in anticipation of a rise in the rate of exchange, he remitted about £17,000 to his friend James long, some short; Campaigns, Spanish bobs and natural ones. And truly they were all natural, for being made of Highlanders' hair, which is blanched with the rain and sun, when they came to be opened in the West Indies they looked like so many of Samson's fireships that he sent among the Philistines, and could be of no use to the Colony if it were not to mix with their lime when they plastered the walls of their houses."

Smyth, merchant in London. Smyth was to act as the Company's correspondent to retire bills drawn upon him from the Continent for the purchases made abroad, and in this connection an incident occurred which unfortunately marred Paterson's whole after-career. According to arrangement, Paterson and Colonel Erskine travelled direct to Holland. The other foreign deputy, Mr Haldane of Gleneagles, was instructed to pass through London and take Smyth by the way, and examine the state of the Company's cash in his hands. To Gleneagles' surprise, he found that Smyth had been unfaithful to his trust, and had decamped with a large part of the funds. An immediate pursuit led to the recovery of a portion of the money, but a balance remained unaccounted for of over £8000.¹ Paterson got much blame in the affair, and his credit was injured. A committee, consisting of Mr William Dunlop, Principal of the College of Glasgow, and Mr Robert Blackwood, two of the leading Directors, was appointed to examine into the business. After an exhaustive inquiry, these gentlemen gave in a report completely exonerating Paterson, and stating that it was entirely a case of misplaced confidence. On being pressed by the committee to say how he proposed to repay the balance, Paterson stated that, by leaving his own business in London abruptly to advance the interests of the Company both in Scotland and abroad, he had lost more than the balance due to them, especially referring to £4000 which he had in the Orphans' Fund and £2000 in the Hampstead Waterworks. He was, therefore, now devoid of funds to pay off the debt. He proposed that the Company should either dismiss him from their service, so that he could return to mercantile pursuits in London, hoping thereby to make good the balance, or that he should be allowed to go abroad in the service of the Directors, they appropriating a large part of his salary for the Company's benefit. The committee recommended the second alternative—viz., that Paterson's services should be retained, and that he should accompany the intended expedition in an official capacity. The Court of Directors, however, disregarded their committee's recommendation and made Paterson stand aside. He might go with the expedition if he chose, but only as a supernumerary.

Up to this time Paterson had been the chief counsellor in all the Company's proceedings and the projector of their plans, but through this unfortunate incident he now lost influence, and as an adviser was quite ignored—a strange turn in affairs, which naturally wounded him to the quick.

It was not until near the close of 1697 that three of the ships, built at Hamburg and Amsterdam, were ready to sail for Scotland, although they had been lying idly at these ports with their complement of men for several months. They arrived in Leith Roads on 20th November, to the no small joy of the proprietors of the Company's stock, many of whom had become dubious of their very existence, and were afterwards taken up the Firth to winter there.

In about four months after the arrival of the ships the following advertisement was issued. It is printed on a folio sheet, with the Company's arms at top :—

EDINBURGH, 12th March 1698.

The Court of Directors of the Indian and African Company of Scotland, having now in readiness Ships and Tenders in very good order, with Provisions and all manner of Things needful for their intended Expedition to settle a Colony in the Indies; give Notice, that for the general encouragement of all such as are willing to go upon the said Expedition—

Everyone who goes on the first Equipage shall Receive and Possess Fifty Acres of Plantable Land and 50 Foot Square of ground at least in the Chief City or Town, and an ordinary House built thereupon by the Colony at the end of 3 years;

Every Councillor shall have double. If anyone shall die, the profit shall descend to his Wife and nearest relations. The family and blood relations shall be transported at the expense of the Company;

The Government shall bestow rewards for special services.

By Order of the Court,

Shortly before the expedition sailed, these arrangements were slightly altered. Each planter was to be indentured for three years, and maintained during the period at the Company's expense, and at the expiry of the three years he was to receive his allotment of land, &c. The officers were to be allowed 100 acres in all, with a house in the capital city proportionable; and the councillors were to have three portions, or 150 acres. The maximum holding was fixed at 150 acres, "to the end that what is taken up may be the better cultivated, and may not be engrossed by a few to the discouragement of other industrious people."

In response to the Company's advertisement for volunteers for their intended expedition "to settle a Colony in the Indies," they had the offer of many more men than they could employ. Owing to the continuance of a severe famine in Scotland, large numbers of the population had been driven to Ireland for subsistence, and Paterson's new enterprise, in addition to its novelty, opened up a fine field for intending emigrants. Out of the numbers offering, 1200 were accepted by the Company, 300 of whom were young men of the best Scottish families,—"Gentlemen-Volunteers," in search of fortune in the far-off settlement. There were also 60 military officers, with many of the rank and file who had served under them in Flanders, and who had been thrown out of employment by the Peace of Ryswick lately concluded. The officers were enrolled under the denomination of "Overseers" and "Sub-Overseers," and the soldiers under that of "Planters," the Company's Act forbidding the enlistment of soldiers as such without the formal sanction of the Lords of the Privy Council, which the Directors did not deem it prudent to ask.

The expedition (its destination being still kept secret) was meant to start in spring, but various delays arising, it was ultimately timed to sail in the month of July 1698. In anticipation of this, the Directors on 8th July elected a Council consisting of seven,¹ some of them in the double

"To give you the characters at large of these 7 Councillors capacity of captains of the ships as well as councillors, in whom they vested the supreme direction of their intended Colony, with power to the survivors to fill up vacancies in case of death or other removal. No provision, however, was made for the appointment of a permanent President of the Council.

Regulations were next framed defining the financial relations of the Council of the Colony to the Directors at home, wherein, among other matters, it was provided that, in return for the fleet of five ships and relative stores, &c., which would be tedious; wherefore I desire you may accept of this in short—

- I. James Cunningham led the Van; he had been a Major in the Scotch forces, and disbanded on the peace; a Pillar of the Kirk, and never out of Scotland before.

(Note.—Herries is in error here. The Rev. William Veitch, the father, died, after long illness, in May 1722, having completed his eighty-second year.)

- "IV. Robert Jollie, a jolly Scotch overgrown Hamburger, who was formerly a Skipper, and used to the Shetland trade, but had for some dozen years been set up at Hamburg in quality of Merchant, and after that a Broker, and now a Councillor.

the Directors were to hand over, the Council were to pay annually to the Company the sum of £7000. This yearly payment could be made void at any time by a payment down of £70,000, the capital value which was placed on the ships, &c.

Herries, in his 'Tract,' roughly estimates that, at this time, the Company had spent or otherwise parted with the whole call-money paid in, nearly £100,000, thus :—

years from Scotland in several trades or occupations, he was, by a stratagem of an acquaintance of mine, called home to take this post upon him about 6 or 7 weeks before we sailed, and was advanced by the interest of the Kirk party, the better to balance that of the Church, and to keep out Dr M——, a reputed Atheist, who would certainly have debauched both. Mr Pennycook was not only Councillor, but likewise Captain, Commodore, and the very Orford of our Navy.

- VI. James Montgomerie, whose designation I cannot well tell, but you may know him by the story of the bloody fight he had with the Spaniard, where so many hundred were killed and taken prisoners, though at the same time there was never a Spaniard hurt. This gentleman was formerly an Ensign in the Scots Guards, but not liking that office, left it and carried a brown musket in another regiment. The reasons of his preferment to this post was his grandfather's being Earl of Eglington, and his own Father by the Mother's side being Major-General Montgomerie.
- VII. Robert Pincarton, a good, downright, rough-spun Tar, never known before by any designation or State Office, save that of Boatswain to Sir William Phipps, when he was on the wreck, and now, poor fellow, a Diver in the Spanish Mines at Carthagena."

£50,000 for Ships built at Hamburg and Amsterdam.

19,000 for Cargoes of Merchandise and Materials for the Colony, including 25 per cent advance which the Company charged on each article.

(say) 22,500 went towards Provisions, payment of the Sailors and other Servants of the Company, and discharge of the Company's Civil List, &c.

£100,000, being the first call of 25 per cent on the stock.

The Directors next prepared and delivered to the councillors sealed sailing orders. In a separate paper the councillors were instructed, after arriving at the place of settlement named in the sealed orders, to debark the people, provisions, and merchandise, &c., and take possession of the place in the Company's name; there to build, plant, and fortify; dispose and employ the ships and men in the best manner for serving and promoting the Colony, and for the most advantage to the Company. After landing, they were with all possible speed to despatch home an exact journal of the voyage, with an account of their landing, proceedings, and also a description of the place of settlement. They were further to name their various places of settlement after well-known places in Scotland, as they should think fit.

At Leith, on 12th July 1698, the newly appointed councillors signed the following oath of fealty :—

“The Oath appointed by the Council-General of the Indian and African Company of Scotland, to be taken by the Councillors appointed, or to be appointed, for the Government of their intended Colony in the Indies—

“We do solemnly promise and swear, in presence of Almighty God, that we shall be faithful and just to the trust reposed in us by the said Company, and shall to the best of our knowledge and skill endeavour to promote the benefit of the said Company and interest of the said Colony, as we shall answer to God.

J. MONTGOMERIE.”

It will be observed that Paterson's name does not appear among the signatory councillors. In virtue of his past services, and his capacity for strong and prudent government, he ought to have been appointed to the position of presiding member of the Council. The Directors found out afterwards that the man whom they had banished from their counsels was the one who alone, if such had been possible, could have saved the ill-starred scheme from failure. In a letter to the Rev. Alexander Shields, written after the first abandonment of the Colony, dated Edinburgh, 6th February 1700, Paterson says :—

“In short, our Tarpolian Councillors and raw heads and undigested thoughts ruined us, and the difficulties I had met with in Scotland were turned to brow-beatings in Caledonia. . . . There was not one of the old Councillors fit for government, and things were gone too far before the new [election] took place.”

CHAPTER V.

THE EXPEDITIONS TO DARIEN.

FIRST EXPEDITION.

OWING to mismanagement in the preparations and want of funds, it was not until two years after the Company's subscription books at Edinburgh and Glasgow had been closed that the first expedition to Darien was ready to sail from Leith Roads. The Company's fleet consisted of five vessels :—

The St Andrew —(Commodore) Captain Robert Pennicuik.	} Carrying from 46 to 70 guns apiece.
The Unicorn —Captain Robert Pinkerton.
The Caledonia —Captain Robert Drummond.
The Endeavour (Pink).	{ Advice yachts or tenders, laden with provisions, military stores, and merchandise. ¹
The Dolphin (Snow).

¹ “St Andrew, our first Tutelar was he,
The Unicorn must next supporter be,
The Caledonia doth bring up the rear
Fraught with brave hardy lads devoid of fear ;
All splendidly equipt, and to the three
The Endeavour and the Dolphin, handmaids be.”
—“Caledonia Triumphans.”

LITH HARBOUR. ABOUT 1700.

Sir John Dalrymple's lively and time-honoured description of the embarkation, as the ships got under way, is well known :—

“On the 26th¹ of July, of the year 1698, the whole city of Edinburgh poured down upon Leith to see the Colony depart, amidst the tears and prayers and praises of relations and friends, and of their countrymen. Many seamen and soldiers whose services had been refused, because more had offered themselves than were needed, were found hid in the ships, and, when ordered ashore, clung to the ropes and timbers, imploring to go, without reward, with their companions. Twelve hundred men sailed in five stout ships.”

Besides those who assembled on the pier of Leith to give the emigrants a hearty send-off, a crowd of interested spectators lined the Castle-hill of Edinburgh, and from that “coigne of vantage” they watched the ships as they sailed down the estuary of the Forth, until they dwindled away in the distance, and finally disappeared on the water's edge.

Although Paterson was really the projector of the expedition, and ought to have been its leader, he was not invited to accompany it in any official position. Notwithstanding this great slight from the Directors of the Company, such was his generous nature and his desire to further the objects of the scheme that he resolved to join the expedition in the private capacity of a "volunteer." Accordingly he went on board the Unicorn on 16th July, accompanied by his wife, her maid, and Thomas Fenner, his clerk. With his usual precaution, he waited on Commodore Pennicuik, commander of the St Andrew, and ventured to suggest that an inspection of the stores on board the fleet should be made, in order that, should any deficiency be found, it might be reported to the Directors in time and put right before the ships weighed anchor. In reply, the Commodore told him that he knew his own business best.

After they had been four days at sea, however, the councillors were summoned on board the St Andrew to hold an inspection of the stores.¹ Reports from the pursers of the various ships were submitted, when, after scrutiny, it was discovered that in place of nine months' provisions, as given out by the Directors, the fleet had stores for six only. In addition, it was found that a large quantity of the bread was made of "damnified" wheat, and that some of the other provisions were rendered unusable through bad packing. In consequence of this discovery, all on board the squadron were forthwith put on short allowance.

The Council designed to put into the Orkneys with a view to sending an express to the Directors intimating the shortage in the provisions; but meeting with foggy and bad weather when passing these islands, they were obliged to proceed without accomplishing this. The ships coasted round the north of Scotland, the purpose being to make Madeira their place of rendezvous, where their sealed orders were to be opened. Up to this time the commanders of the various ships were in ignorance of their precise destination, having been shipped by the Company ostensibly for Guinea and the West Indies.

Towards the end of August Madeira was sighted, and on the 29th, after landing, the Council forwarded letters to the Directors at home by way of Holland and Lisbon. They advised them of their prosperous voyage so far, and intimated the unexpected deficiency in the provisions, accompanying this with a pressing request that the needful supplies be forwarded with all possible speed.

During their four or five days' rendezvous at Madeira, the Council, with the various ships' monies, purchased twenty-seven pipes of wine and some provisions; while the officers and gentlemen-volunteers, in consequence of their short allowance on board, were glad to exchange their scarlet coats, cloaks, and swords for extra provisions and wine.

At the time of sailing from Leith, Captain William Veitch, one of the seven original councillors, although he had taken the oath of office, was prevented at the last moment from joining the expedition, and the remaining councillors, on reaching Madeira, took the opportunity of filling up the vacancy by assuming Paterson in his place. At Madeira also the Council broke open their sailing orders, which directed them to call first at Crab Island, in the vicinity of Porto Rico. At Crab Island they consulted their second sailing orders, which contained instructions to steer for Golden Island, in the Bay of Acla, near the Gulf of Darien, their ultimate destination. They proceeded thither, and, after careful soundings, cast anchor in a fine natural harbour four miles to the east of Golden Island. On 3rd November they landed and took possession, and shortly thereafter obtained the sanction of the native chiefs to settle among them.

The following journal, taken from the 'Darien Papers,' gives an interesting description of the voyage after leaving Madeira, the arrival at Darien, and the first settlement of the Colony in the new world. The journal appears to be the official account of the progress of the expedition from day to day, and the writer of it, Mr Rose, seems to have occupied the position of Secretary to the Council in the Colony.

September 2nd, 1698.—We weighed anchor from Madera road, the Governor having been very civil to us; the Comadore gave him 15 guns, Capt. Pinkerton 13, and Capt. Drummond 11, all which he particularly returned with two less. Wee had a fresh breeze at E.N.E., and stood away W.S.W.

the usual ceremony of ducking several of the Ships Crew who had not passed before; they were hoisted to the main yard arm, and let down 3 several times with a soss into the sea, out over head and ears, their legs being tyed somewhat closs, which was pretty good sport.

Sep. 29.¹

Sep. 30. Moderate gales and fair weather; at 6 in the morning wee made the Islands of Antigo and Monsirat, at noon the Island of Redondo, being a small island, or rather a rock like the Bass; bore S.S.E. halfe a mile distant, and the Island of Nevis N.W. and B.W. 4 leagues. It is a very pleasant-like Island; the fort hoisted their flag and wee our Colours.

1 October. Moderate gales and fair weather. At 6 last night the west end of St Christophers bore N. $\frac{1}{2}$ E. distant 4 leagues. This day at noon the S.E. end of Sta Cruze bore W. $\frac{1}{2}$ N. distant 7 leagues.

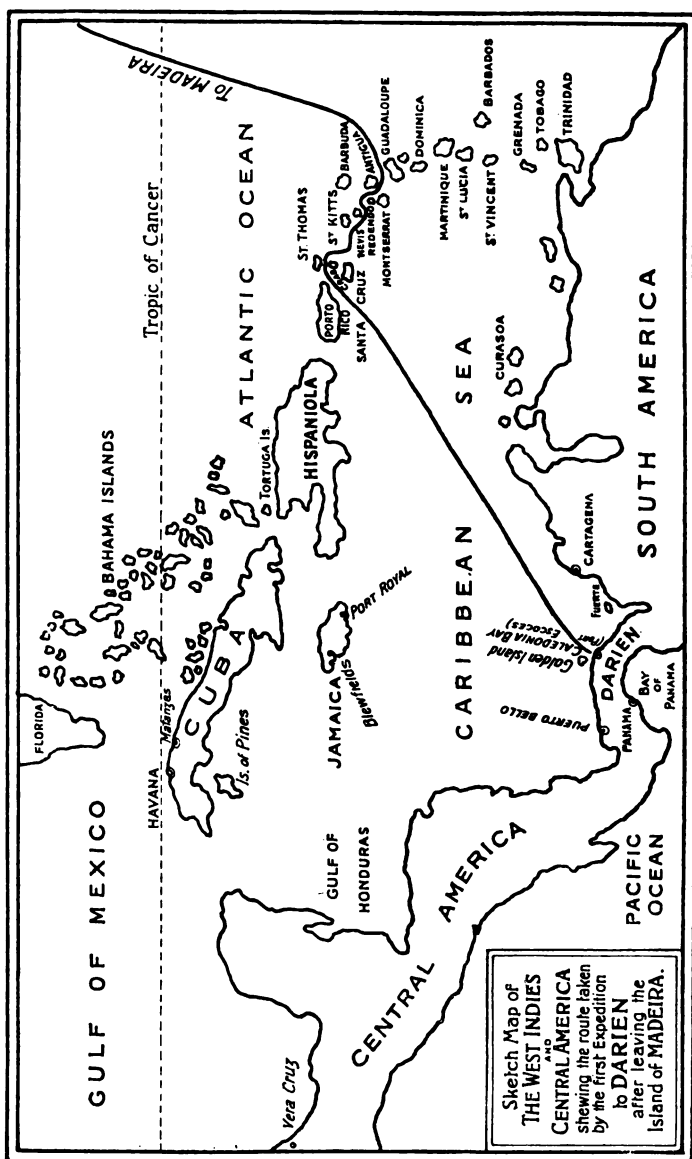

2. Yesterday the Council met on board the Comadore, whene it was resolved that Captain Pinkertoun in the Unicorn, with the Snow, and Mr Paterson, should be immediately despatched for the Island of St Thomas, being a free port of the Danes, in order to get pilots for the Main and what intelligence were possible of the state of Darien. Accordingly, at 6 at night they parted from us. Wee steered directly for Crab Island, which wee made in the morning, bearing N.W. $\frac{1}{2}$ distant 5 leagues.

3d. This morning wee went ashore and took possession of the Island in the name of the Company of Scotland Trading to Affrica, &c. Wee left some of our people ashore all night, and stood off to sea, it looking like bad weather, much thunder, lightning, and rain.

4. In the forenoon our men came on board, and wee bore away to Leeward, where is the best anchoring. About halfe an hour past 4, in Frenchman's bay, wee saw a sloop with Danish colours, with a tent on shoare with the same hoisted on the top of it. Wee immediatly stood in and anchored closs by her. The Commadore sent to know quhat she was and her business there, who answered, they were Danes with a Governour and 15 men sent by the Gouvernour of St Thomas, to assert the K. of Denmark's right to that Island, and to protest against our having any thing to do there. This sloop was dispatched away as soon as possible after Captain Pinkertoun's arrival there, viz. on Sunday at 2 o'clock, but we landed that morning by 8; so that wee told them they came too late. However, they offered their protest, as did the Governour of St Thomas, to Captain Pinkertoun; this they owned was matter of form, and what they were obliged to do to please the Court; but wished with all their hearts wee settled there, for then they wold have a bullwark between them and those of Portorico (a rich and large Island and very populous very near) who were very troublesome neighbouring. These 24 hours wee have had much wind, with thunder, lightning, and great rain.

Oct. 5. This day Captain Pinkertoun arrived with the Snow, and brought one Captain Allison with him, who freely offered to go along with us to Golden Island. This man is one of the eldest Privateers now alive, and had several times caryed away their people, and that was the reason that Captain Pedro (whom he promised to bring aboard with him, when last here) wold not ventur till he were better assured of our integrity. He likewayes told us that there were some French who lived among the Indians towards the Samballas to the westward. Fair weather. This day wee landed and took possession.¹

Novr. 4. The weather fair, with land and sea breezes. This forenoon wee weighed and got in to the harbour, but the Unicorn unhappily struck on that sunken rock within the heads, and beat of some of her sheathing. There were 40 men sent from each ship to clear away and make huts for our sick men.

5. Wee sent all our sick ashoare, and sent 30 men more from each ship to clear away. The Council met and went to view the most proper place for a Fort. Fair weather.

6. Fair weather. This morning arrived a canao with one Frenchman, 2 Creolians of Martinico, and 4 Indians; as also a periager with Captain Ambrosio and Captain Pedro, who live about 16 leagues to the westward.

Novr. 7th. The weather fair, with small breezes. Our people are employed in making of huts and clearing away ground.

8. The wind and weather as above. There hath

“What should they do but sing His praise,
Who led them through the watery maze?”

been a great number of Indians on board ships, whom we use very kindly, and who consume a great deal of liquor.

9. The weather as above.

10. This day Captain Andreas dined on board the Comadore with his first wife and his sister; they are generally of a small size as well as the men; their features are indifferent (bating their colour), only their eyes are somewhat too small. They had a single cloath wrapt about them in form of a peticoat made of cotton, with a sort of a linen mantle about their shoulders; a great many beads about their necks and arms, with large gold rings put through the gristle that divides their nostrils; they are very submissive to their husbands, who notwithstanding are very kind to them. They told there had been a skirmish between the Indians of the Gulph and the Spaniard. That the last had killed about 20 men, and had taken as many women for slaves. That they knew of our being here and were exceeding angry with them for making friendship with us. Fair weather.

11. The people ashore are employed in making of huts, clearing way, &c., and those on board in ordering their holds, overhauling their rigging, blocksails, &c.

12. Much rain in the night.

13. Much rain in the morning. We saw a ship Saturday to the westward, which we beleaved to be Captain Lang in the Rupert prize, who we heard was in the Gulph of Uraba.¹

¹ 13th Novr. This was Captain Richard Long, Commander of the small man-of-war Rupert Prize, which had been fitted out by the English Government as a spy and with the view of forestalling the Darien Company in their occupation of the Isthmus;

14. We had sharp showers of rain with the wind round the compass.

15. It has rained very hard, and gusts of wind. This evening Captain Lang in his boat came to visit us.

16. Captain Lang dined on board the Comadore. Much rain and thunder, which hinders our work.

17. Captain Lang dined on board Captain Pinkertoun. In the evening Lang's boat went to his Sloop which lay at the Isle of Pinas. Much thunder, lightning, and rain.

18. This morning Captain Lang and Captain Pinkertoun went for the Isle of Pinas.

19. At 8 o'clock this morning Major Cunninghame, Mr Mackay, and Captain Pennycuik set out to the westward, and about 4 in the afternoon got on board Captain Lang, where they with Capt. Pinkertoun stayed all night, it blowing hard so that our long-boats could not thither till next morning. Much rain, fresh gales of wind, thunder, and lightning.

but the ship arrived too late on the scene. Captain Long acted in an unfriendly way towards the colonists. A copy of his dispatch to the Council of Trade in England concerning the Scotch Colony, written from Jamaica, was found among the Company's papers. In it he says: "They [the Scots] are in such a crabbed hold, that it may be difficult to beat them out of it. . . . I saw the settlement and order of the Scots, which appeared modest, and they declared themselves to me that they would be no harbourer of pirates, nor invade any man's settled land, but those that would disturb them they would grant letters of reprisal against them." Immediately on receipt of Captain Long's information, the English Government sent secret instructions to the Colonial Governors, which resulted in proclamations being issued by several of them against the Scots. Secretary Vernon's first dispatch to the Governor-General of Virginia is dated from Whitehall as early as 2nd January 1698/9

20. About 8 in the morning our longboats got up, together with Captain Pedro in his periager. What others have found or may think of Lang wee know, but he appears to us to be of no great reach; he has a full and ample comission, his principal design it seems was to find out wrecks and to fish. He own'd and so did all his people that his boat had not been so much as been ashore in any place betuixt the gulfe and the Isle of Pinas, nor had he any conversation with those people, so that he can have no pretence upon our settlement. Wee left him about 10 o'clock, he said he was bound for Jamaica. This night the Councilours lay in a little bay about 2 leagues to the westward of the river Pinas. In the night time a fresh gale variable and some small showers.¹

Novr. 21. In the morning they weighed and sounded all along the coast, and about noon found a most excellent harbour about 4 leagues to the westward of where they lay all night, capable of containing 10,000 sail of ships. It is made by an elbow of the main to the Eastward, and a range of keys about it, 10 in number, running to the Eastward above 2 leagues. To one of those called Laurence Key the greatest ship in England may lay her side to. Here the privateers used to carreen, but the inconveniency of that place is that ships may not only come in both from the Eastward and Westward, but between several of the keyes, so that it can not be defended without a great many forts as wel as men. After they had surveyed this bay they got to the river Coco. About 4 o'clock they landed and went to Ambrosio's house, which is a good league from the water side.¹ It stands upon the banks of this river with about 10 or a dozen lesser houses about it. Their houses are on the sea hand inaccessible in a manner, being so advantageously situated that no stranger can come at them that way by reason of the numerous unseen shoals, small rocks, and banks.

When they came near, Ambrosio advanced about 50 paces with 20 followers, all clothed in white loose frocks with fringes round the bottoms, and lances in their hands. He saluted them very kindly, and gave them a calabash full of liquor almost like lambswool, which they call Mischlew, being made of Indian corn and potatoes; this they get drunk with all often. Before the house about 20 paces it was very smooth and clean; the house was about 90 foot long 35 in breadth and 30 in height; it was curiously thatched with palmetto royal, and over that, Cajan leaves; the floor was of a firm earth like Tarras, very smooth and clean; the sides were of large canes about the bigness of a man's leg, and near an inch asunder. In this house lived Ambrosio and Pedro with their whole families, in all about 40 persons. There was an old woman who was very stirring about the house, she seem'd to be near 60, but upon asking her age the Frenchman told she was about 120. They could not believe it, and were persuaded they were mistaken in the computation of time; he assured them not, and as an undeniable demonstration shewed the sixth generation of that woman's body in the house, which indeed was very surprising. She is Pedroe's grandmother; when it was assured that it was common among them to live to 150 or 160 years age, yet its observed that those of them that converse often with the Europeans and drink their strong liquors are of short life.

Novr. 22. In the morning they had some plantans, potatoes, and wild hog dresst for breakfast, after their fashion. Then Ambrosio and Pedro went out with their guns to kill some fowl for the strangers. Pedro returned with some partridges the largest and best ever they saw, being bigger than capons, and exceedingly sweet. They being afraid it wold be late took leave ere Ambrosio returned, Pedro and the Frenchman conveying them to the water side. They lay that night at the eastermost of the keyes mentioned before. Pedro did climb high cocornut trees and threw down a great number most delicious for the juyce and kernel. They are very big. This Pedro is incredibly dexterous at the bow and arrow, which he show'd them by shooting frequently in one place; they learn their boys to shoot with blunt arrows.

23. By day light they weighed and got to the Isle of Pinas with their pinaces by noon, and at night home. Captain Lang sailed the Sunday before.

24. Much wind and rain.

25. Wind and rain as above.

27. Very much rain and wind.

28. These 24 houres there has fallen a prodigious quantity of rain.

29. Much rain with fresh gales.

30. This being St Andrew's day, the Councilors dined on board the Comadore, where Captain Andreas was invited, who being inquired at anent his having any correspondence with the Spaniard as was reported, he ingenuously confessed that the Spaniards had been friendly to him and had made him a Captain; that he was obliged for his safty to keep fair with them; and that they assured him wee were nothing but privateers who had no design to setle, but to plunder both Spaniard and Indians and be gone in 2 or 3 months time; and if that he assisted us any way, as soon as wee were gone they should destroy him and his.

He got all possible assurance of the contrar, which he appeared to be fully satisfyed with, and desired a Comission, and to be taken under the protection of our Government with his followers, upon which he should give all his right to this part of the Country which relished wel enough. He went away and promised to return in 2 or 3 days.

December 1. Much thunder, lightning, and rain.

2. The weather continues very bad which hinders the work much.

3. Great showers of rain with much wind. Captain Andreas came this day on board the St Andrew where the Counciloris were. He had his Comission read to him, and expounded in Spanish, whereby the Council made him one of their Captains to command the Natives in and about his own territories, and received him and all submitting to him into the protection of their Government, he being therby obliged with his followers to obey, assist, and defend them and all their concerns upon all occasions. To all which he heartily agreed and seemed very wel satisfyed. Then the Preses of the Council for the time, did in presence of the Councilours and several others and some of the Andreas people, deliver him his Commission written on parcement, with the Colonye's Seal and very broad gold stript and flour'd ribbon appended, joyning hands together he promising to be just and faithful to us and our interest. He had at that time given him a broad basket hilted sword and a pair of good pistols, with which he promised to defend us all to the last drop of his blood against our Enemyes. He presented the Council with a bow and a bunch of arrows as a token of his kindness and friendship. Then he and those with him got a hearty glass, and at drinking the Company at home their health, 7 guns were fired, which he took as a great favour; he stayed on board all night.

December 4. Much thunder, lightning, and rain.

5. Some wind and rain.

6. Showres of rain with squales of wind.

The sons of Captain Diego and Captain Ambrosio came and stayed with us 4 or 5 days. The natives come evry other day with plantans and yams; the common people among us buy them from them and give them small trifles for them, which they are wel satisfied with.

7. Blustering weather with some showres.

8. Wind and weather as above.

9. Wind Northerly. Sometimes most excellent fish taken here, as also Tortoises (but very few as yet, not having time nor nets fit for them,) some of them above 2, others above 3, 00 weight: they are the best of meat. One of them will serve 100 men of reasonable appetites.

10. There is excellent Cedar trees in great abundance, as also Mahoggany, Yellow Sanders, Lignum vitæ, Manchinill excellent for inlaying, and many others of great use. There are hopes of finding out the Nicoragu the best of lit for Scarlet, as also Banileos is here in great quantity, an excellent perfume and much used in the finest Cochoilat, as also in this Countrey excellent fruits, such as Cocoa nuts wherof Cochoilat is made. Vanelias, Sugar Canes, Mayis, Oranges, Plantans, Bonanos, Yams, Manioc and several others all very good, the ground very fertile and rich.

11. This morning came on board the Commadore a French longboat, with the Lieuetenant of the Ship she belonged to, and the purser of a Dutch. The ship to which the Lieuetenant belonged is named the Zan-toigne of 42, (had but 32 mounted,) commanded by Monsieur Vite Thomas. The Dutch ship was one of 22 guns, a trader upon the Coast. The Frenchman reported he came out in company with those that returned the Church plate to Carthagena. She is a Merchant ship, but has the King's Comission, and halfe the Company payed by the King; he was very lakey, so begg'd liberty to stop his lakes in our port which wee freely granted. The Dutch Ship being afraid of the Barlivento fleet kept him company, and likewise desired our protection. She is richly loaded and has been upon the coast some time, yet has most of her cargo still on board, being bound to the coast of Carthagena. She must be here till the Barlivento fleet pass for Porto Bello.

12. This morning the French ship anchored near Golden Island, and the Dutchman came into the harbour, directly he saluted the Commadore with 7 guns who returned him 5.

In the afternoon the French Captain came on board; he told us all the newes on the Coast, That the President of Panama had given an account to the Governours of Carthagena and Porto Bello of our arrival and settlement. The Spaniards along the whole Coast are in a wonderful consternation upon the matter. He told that 18 dayes ago one Whan Bernardo (a very rich and honest man) was sent with a longboat and 37 men by the Governour of Carthagena with a Comission to know what wee were and our design here; he was told there was nothing heard of him, so the Frenchman concluded the boat was sunk, being so old and lakey that she could hardly swim. He furder said that there were 4 sail of Ships about 50 guns each newly come from Spain, whereof the Dartmouth an English man-of-warr of 52 guns taken by the French was one; that they beleaved our design was upon the river Meschassippi, so were gone into the gulph of Mexico to seek us. That the Barlivento fleet was now at Carthagena, consisting of 3 sail, viz. the General of 56 guns, one of 36 and another of 28 guns, the Vice-Admiral of 40 guns being gone with a Dutch Ship of 32 guns whom they made prize, as also 2 English Sloops, for trading upon the Coast of Veracruze.

Decbr. 13. In the afternoon the French ship came in, he saluted the Commadore with 9 guns who returned (he having the King's Comission and Colours) the same number, then 3 of thanks; he had also the like return, then one, and then like to that.

14. This day Captain Lang's boat came into the harbour and told us he sailed for Jamaica on Sunday last, that he had left 3 men and a woman with Captain Diego in the gulph, and that the Barlivento fleet consisting of several sail of great ships and abundance of small veshels full of souldiers, were lying at the Burus taking in provisions in order to attack with all their strength in a few days. This obliges us to make all dispatches with our battery. The Council have ordered their ships in a line of battle in the mouth of the harbour. Fair weather.

15. Captain Andreas sent word that the Spaniards were marching from Panama to Porto Bello, with a great number of men in order to attack us.

16. Several other Indians came in and gave the same account. The battery is going quickly on ; our men are very hearty and seem to long for a visit from Jaque, that they might have a just pretence to their gold mines not far off.

17. There is a look out made from which ships or vessels within 10 leagues can be descryed.

18. Fair weather, the fortification near finished.

19. This morning one of the men whom Captain Lang left towards the gulfe, with a boy and two Indians, came in a canao and told that a Spanish periager landing where they were, the Indians and they set upon them, and killed 7 of them ; this was found fault with (by) us, least Lang's men should be thought ours, and so wee thought to be the first breakers of peace. It was also told here that Lang had been a dayes journey from his ship among the Spanish Indians, on purpose to misrepresent us, calling us thieves and robbers and disbanded souldiers not ouned or protected by the King of England.

This day the battery was finished, 16 twelve pounders being mounted on it, and wee are now in such a condition as that nothing more is wished than a visit from Jaque.

20. The French ship came out and anchored by our Ship at the mouth of the harbour. Fair, and wind at N.B.E.

21. Some sharpe showres of rain, and a fresh gale as above ; Entrenchments are making.

22. The Frenchman warpt out a little without us. Captain Paussigo of Carret bay, who is hearty and cordial to our interest, came and among other things told, that close by about 2 miles distant only, there were several gold mines, which he promised to shew, and did let some of the Councilors see few parcels of gold which he affirmed he got from thence, which was extraordinary fine.

23. Fair weather. Captain Ambrosio being upon this place tells that the Spaniard are marching with 600 of them and 200 of the South sea Indians, (who can travel through the woods,) to attack us in the night if possible, but its feared with us they will not come, but whatever be in it, the work goes wel on, the men working with much vigour and resolution. Ambrosio has been very kindly and civilly used and a present given him.

This day came in a small sloop loaded with flower, beefe, &c. from Jamaica. The Comander was sent by Captain Moon who is mentioned before, the Cargo was consigned to Captain Allison.

24. In the morning early the French ship got under sail—the Council not having ended their dispatches for Scotland which they designed by her. Captain Pennycook went in his pinnace to know whether he designed to come to an anchor at Golden Island or put directly to sea. The Captain had drunk pretty hard the night before with Pedro, Ambrosio, and some other of the Samballas Indians, so that he was then asleep. The wind had blown hard at No. and there came in a great sea, and with all it fell little wind, so that she fell away to leeward a great pace, where was nothing but an Iron shoare. She had certainly been stranded on the first point, had not Captain Pennycuik made his boat get ahead and tow her. She weathered that point not twenty fathom, then was obliged to anchor in a little bay. At the Captain's desire, Captain Pennycuik sent for a long boat, an anchor, and cable, with all the pinnaces to row them out, but stayed himself to assist what was possible, and at the Captain's earnest desire promised to stay by him as long as he kept the ship; for the sailors being all hot headed since the night before, did not mind what their Captain said to them. The ship did ride about 3 quarters of an hour after they anchored, and then her best bower cable broke, and in halfe an hour after the small bower gave way, so ashoare she went upon the rocks, where in halfe an hour she was all to peeces, no boat daring to come near her. Captain Pennycuik was as good as his promise and stayed till he saw the Captain (who could not swim) upon a raft and gone, then took his opportunity and swam ashoare, having received some small wounds and bruises from the wreck and rocks, the sea beating on them furiously. There were 22 out of 56 drowned —tis said many of them occasioned by the weight of gold and money they had about their necks (having broke up chests); others beatt to peeces upon the rocks after they had swam ashoare. The Captain had in his round house in Gold and Silver to the value of 60,000 peeces of eight, and in goods not disposed of to the value of 30,000 Crowns.

25. The French Captain and Lieuetennent went on board the Commadore, being both extreamly bruised.

The men were dispersed into the several ships. Officers and men were sent to guard the wreck.

26. Fair weather and a good gale at N.B.E.

27. This morning the French Captain went with two divers belonging to the Ship to see what could be got from the wreck. He gets all possible assistance to save all that comes ashore.

The foregoing journal, along with a list of deaths since leaving Scotland, was forwarded to the Directors in a letter dated 28th December. This was the Council's first communication to headquarters after landing at Darien, the delay arising from their not possessing a small coasting sloop suitable for conveying dispatches. On this occasion the Council employed a turtling-sloop (Edward Sands, master), which was returning to Jamaica after her cargo of provisions had been sold to the colonists. The bearer of the Council's dispatches—Alexander Hamilton, Accountant-General of the Colony—was deputed at this time to visit Scotland and represent to the Directors, by word of mouth, certain matters connected with the Colony which it was not thought desirable to commit to writing. One of the seven original councillors—Major Cunningham of Eickett—also took his passage in the same sloop, having severed his connection with the Colony, contrary both to his engagement with the Directors and the wishes of his fellow-councillors.

The expedition had been timed to land in Darien in the beginning of winter,—the “dry season,”—the most healthful time of the year for Europeans to face the climate of the Isthmus.

In the letter referred to, in which the hand of Paterson can be discerned, the Council represent themselves as being highly pleased with the situation and climate of their place of settlement, and as hopeful of the ultimate success of their enterprise. The sequel showed that far too sanguine opinions of the climate and soil had been formed.

The letter runs as follows :—

NEW EDINBURGH,
CALEDONIA, 28th December 1698.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,—Our last to you was from the Maderas of the 29th of August, and sent by the several ways of Holland and Portugal, to the contents whereof we now refer, and in particular to the State of Provisions therewith sent, and which we now find doth considerably fall short even of what was then computed, by reason of the badness of the Cask. The account of the remaining part of our voyage, together with the most material transactions since, you may know by the enclosed Journal or Diary of our proceedings.

We now send you our Letters and Dispatches by Mr Alexander Hamilton, Merchant, who takes the opportunity of passing to you by the way of Jamaica over to England, to whom we desire you would order Forty shillings Sterling to be paid Weekly, towards his expences, the time he shall stay with you negotiating our affairs.¹

The wealth, fruitfulness, health and good situation of the Country proves for the better, much above our greatest expectations, which God Almighty seems to have wonderfully reserved for this occasion, and now to have prepared our way, and disposed the Indies to that purpose. In our passage hither several of our number have been taken from us by death (whose names we have herewith sent you) and whereof the loss of our two Ministers is the most sensible to us. We therefore entreat you would use your utmost endeavours with the General Assembly, for procuring others to supply that great want. As to the Country, we find it very healthful; for though we arrived here in the Rainy season, from which we had little or no shelter for several weeks together, and many sick among us, yet they are so far recovered, and in so good a state of health as could hardly anywhere be expected among such a number of Men together; nor know we anything here of those several dangerous and mortal distempers so prevalent in the English and other American Islands.

In fruitfulness this Country seems not to give place to any in the world ; for we have several of the fruits as Cocoa-Nuts, whereof Chocolate is made, Bonellos Sugar-Canes, Maize, Oranges, Plantains, Mangoe, Yams, and several others, all of them of the best of their kind anywhere found.

Nay, there is hardly a spot of ground here but what may be cultivated ; for even upon the very tops and sides of the hills and mountains, there is commonly three or four foot deep of rich earth, without so much as a stone to be found therein. Here is good hunting and fowling, and excellent fishing in the bays and creeks of the Coast ; so that could we improve the season of the year just now begun, we should soon be able to subsist of ourselves, but fortifying and building will lose us a whole year's planting.

By the want of sloops, or small coasting vessels, we have hitherto had no opportunity of disposing any part of the Cargo, or doing other needful things.

Since the loss of the French Ship mentioned in the Journal, we understand that the Captain had an underhand Correspondence, in tampering with some of the natives whom he intended to carry away with him, which heightens our jealousy that the French have a design upon this place, or at least to make a settlement hereabout. And we heartily wish that our Most Gracious King were truly informed of what consequence it will be both to his greatness and security, to countenance and encourage us his loyal and dutiful subjects here, that our Prince and Country be not only deprived of so valuable a Jewel, but lest the same should fall a prey to some of our rival neighbours. This will be the Company's part to notice after these dispatches shall come to hand.

You have enclosed a List of several goods and merchandises vendable and proper for this place; our situation being incomparable for the Trade of the Coast, where (besides our Inland Trade) there is commonly but 2 or 3, or at most but 8 or 10 days' sail to the best places of Trade upon the Coast, and to the outmost considerable islands adjoining. And we desire that particular merchants in Scotland, and elsewhere, may be encouraged to trade and correspond hither, in which we hope they will sufficiently find their account.

We have also sent you a state of what supplies of Provisions, Stores and Merchant goods are absolutely necessary for the present support of the Colony, referring it to the Company to determine what reasonable consideration they will have for the sums that shall be advanced for that purpose; And we entreat that all possible expedition may be used in sending us these needful supplies; for without that we shall not only be incapable of making you suitable returns, but this hopeful undertaking, together with ourselves, will run no small risk of being inevitably lost. But however it be (by the help of God) we shall not fail to do our utmost in making speedy and suitable returns; and shall always account it our greatest honour to expose our persons, and all that's most near and dear to us, in promoting this hopeful design, as not only promising Profit and Glory to the Company, and all who are concerned with them, but as being the likeliest means that ever yet presented towards the enabling our Countrymen to revive, recover, transmit to posterity, the virtue, lustre, and wonted Glory of their renowned Ancestors ; and to lay a foundation of wealth, security, and greatness to our Mother Kingdom for the present and succeeding Ages. In which we can no way doubt of your most hearty concurrence and utmost support. So praying Almighty God would bless and prosper the Company in all their undertakings. — We remain, Right Honourable, you most humble servants,

ROBERT JOLLY.
J. MONTGOMERY.
DAN. MACKAY.
ROB. PENNICOOK.
ROB. PINCARTON.
WILL. PATERSON.

P.S.—We entreat you to send us a good Engineer, who is extremely wanted here. This place being capable of being strongly fortified. You'll understand by our's from Maderas, the Danger as well as the Tediousness of our Passage North-about, so that if the Ships can conveniently be fitted out from Clyde, it will save a good deal of time in their passage and be far less hazardous.¹

The list of deaths accompanying the preceding letter was afterwards printed in Edinburgh

¹ On the same day—28th December 1698—the Council issued a Proclamation or Declaration, addressed to the world, from “New Edinburgh,” announcing the principles on which their Colony of Caledonia was to be conducted. They declared that it was to be a free port, with full liberty of conscience in matters of religion to all nations. (For full text of the Declaration, see Appendix B.)

This is a true List compared by me,

ROD. MACKENZIE,

Secy. to the said Company.

No doubt, every one will justly regret the loss of his own nearest friend, but it's a great and general Mercy that of so many as went crowded in Five Ships, upon so long and tedious a voyage as they had, so few are dead; Especially considering, that on their way they had the misfortune of taking in bad Water upon an uninhabited island, in the beginning of the Rainy Season, which occasioned general sickness among them; tho' soon after their Landing in Caledonia (thanks be to God) they recovered their health so much (even beyond expectation) that, when the Express came away, there were but five of all our men who were not at work in building of Forts and Houses. And as even a greater number of so many as went, might have died by this time, had they all remained at home, so it may be some satisfaction to the nearest friends of the deceased that their names shall stand upon Record as being among the first brave Adventurers that went upon the most noble, most honourable, and most promising undertaking that Scotland ever took in hand.

From the foregoing list it will be noticed that Paterson had the great grief to lose his wife by fever shortly after landing in Darien. She was buried with solemn honours, some dropping-guns being fired on the occasion. A few days previously his clerk, Thomas Fenner, an Englishman, had also died.¹ Yet in spite of these domestic bereavements, he did not bate a jot of heart or hope, but with manly fortitude continued his unwearied efforts on behalf of the Company.

¹ On 7th October there appears in the list of deaths the name of "James Paterson, Volunteer." It has been surmised by some writers that this young gentleman was Paterson's only child, but we have been unable to find any confirmation of this.

CHAPTER VI.

THE EXPEDITIONS TO DARIEN.

WE need not detail here the various events connected with the first occupation and abandonment of Darien, as these are narrated in Paterson's special Report to the Directors which follows. Suffice it to say that on the 20th of June 1699, within eight months of the date of their landing, the surviving settlers, now reduced to less than 900, hurriedly evacuated Darien. Paterson, who was seriously ill at the time, protested strongly against the abandonment. He was the last man to leave Darien, and had to be carried on board the Unicorn. After a disastrous voyage, during which many on board succumbed, he arrived at New York on 14th August, but so broken in health that his life was despaired of for a time. In about two months thereafter he took his passage in the Company's ship, the Caledonia, bound from New York for Scotland, and arrived in Edinburgh on the 5th of December, somewhat recovered in mind though still shattered in body. The Report referred to was drawn up at the request of the Court of Directors shortly after his return to Scotland. In addition to the details which it gives relating to the daily life of the Colony and the events which led up to its collapse, it forms a vindication of his own conduct there. Explanatory notes have been added to the Report where additional information seems desirable.

REPORT BY WILLIAM PATERSON TO THE DIRECTORS.

REPORT of Matters relating to the COLONY of CALEDONIA, made to the Right Honble. THE COURT OF DIRECTORS of the INDIAN AND AFRICAN COMPANY OF SCOTLAND.

At Edinburgh, the nineteenth day of December, 1699.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

On the sixteenth day of July 1698, I arrived on board the Company's ship the Unicorn, in order to my voyage in the afternoon. I went on board the Saint Andrew; and although I was not of the Council, yet the care and concern I had for the success obliged me to speak to Captain Pennicook for calling a Council before we set sail in order to consider how they were provided for the voyage, and to represent to this Court what might be defective: but I was answered—"I must give him leave to think that he knew his business and the instructions he had to follow," or to this purpose.

Two or three days after we sailed, the Council was called on board the Saint Andrew, where they found the provisions and necessaries for the voyage fall exceedingly short of what was given out or expected; whereupon the people were reduced to a much shorter allowance; and the next day the Council wrote letters signifying their condition, designing to land those letters at Orkney; but the foggy, hazy weather and currents not only prevented that, but endangered the ships, and occasioned the separation of the Unicorn and Endeavour Pink from the rest.

After our meeting at Madeira, the Council wrote their condition by way of Lisbon and Holland; but in as sparing and general terms as possible, lest these letters should be intercepted to the prejudice of our designs. These letters were dated the 29th day of August 1698.

When Captain Pinkerton and I were at the Island of St Thomas about the beginning of October, we met with one Captain Richard Moon of Jamaica, who commanded a sloop of about eighty tons. He was bound from New York to Curasao with provisions, but by the way touched at Saint Thomas, where he met with us. The man I had known in Jamaica many years before; and we persuaded him to follow us to the rest of our ships then riding at Crab Island. When he came he found our goods so dear and ill-sorted for his purpose, that, upon the conditions we proposed, he would not part with any of his provisions; upon which I represented to the Council that it might be of ill consequence for us not only to miss such a quantity of good and new provisions, but the report he might give of our goods being overrated would unavoidably be an ill preparative for others ; whereas the agreement with him, though at a dear rate, would encourage him and many more to come to us with the greater speed and earnestness ; also that I had heard the goods were considerably overrated. But however it was, two or three hundred pounds' loss ought not to be put in balance with the risk of the design : which, if it miscarried, I was apprehensive the Company would, however, get but a lame account of their cargo,—Wherefore, it was better to risk a part of it upon the prospect of something than inevitably to loss it without any prospect at all. To all this I was answered, that they were not obliged to take notice of any particular man's assertions as to the over-valuing or ill buying the goods ; but rather to believe the prime cost was as in the Company's invoice ; and that they would not be so imposed upon by Capt. Moon. Thus Mr Moon parted from us. But before he went I took an opportunity to tell him, that by reason of the stowage in those crowded ships, he could not now have a sight of the greatest part of our Cargo ; but if he and his friends would send us a sloop with provisions from Jamaica, and also come himself as soon as he could, I did not doubt but he would dispose of them to his sufficient satisfaction, which he promised to do, and had some discourse thereof with the rest of the Councillors before we parted.

During the voyage, our Marine Councillors did not only take all upon them, but likewise brow-beat and discouraged every body else, yet we had patience, hoping things would mend when we came ashore ; but we found ourselves mistaken ; for though our Masters at sea had sufficiently taught us that we fresh-water men knew nothing of their salt-water business,—yet when at land, they were so far from letting us turn the chase, that they took upon them to know everything better than we.

I must confess it troubled me exceedingly to see our affairs thus turmoiled and disordered, by tempers and dispositions as boisterous and turbulent as the elements they are used to struggle with, which are at least as mischievous masters as ever they can be useful servants. To this disease I proposed as a present ease and a part of a remedy, that a President of the Council should be chosen for a month, and that the first should be a land Councillor, and that every land Councillor might take his turn before any of those of the sea should come in place. This, I reckoned, would be four months; and in this time I was in hopes that we might be able to make some laws, orders, and rules of Government, and by People's management in the time, be better able to judge who might be most fit to preside for a longer time, not exceeding a year. This my thoughts I imparted to our land Councillors; but they, like wise men, had begun to make their Court, and agreed beforehand with those of the sea that the Presidency should last but a week; and though I urged that it would be to make a mere May game of the Government, and that it would reduce all things to uncertainty and contradictions, yet this determination of the rest was unalterable. Upon which Mr Montgomery was chosen the first President; after which we began to proceed to business.¹

¹ The dissensions among the Councillors and their deplorable mismanagement were not least among the contributory causes of failure of the settlement, and these rendered quite

The first thing fallen upon was a place of landing; but the Sea Councillors were for a mere Morass, neither fit to be fortified nor planted, nor indeed for the men to lie upon. But this was carried by main force and a great struggle, although I know no reason they had for it, unless it might be to save one of their boats the trouble, once in two or three days, to bestow three or four hours to supply the Land-men with water. We were upon clearing and making Huts upon this improper place near two months, in which time experience—the schoolmaster of fools—convinced our masters that the point now called Fort Saint Andrew was more useless all the efforts of Paterson towards a firm and unanimous rule in the Colony. In carrying out the weekly presidency, each Councillor seemed bent on undoing the work of his predecessor in the chair; the marine Councillors, in their double capacity of Ship-Captain and Councillor, especially lording it over the others. The Directors saw reason to alter this state of affairs when making arrangements for the second expedition. In a letter, 10th February 1700, to James Gibson, captain of the Rising Sun, they refer to “the unanswerable evil consequences of the Commanders of our first ships unaccountable conduct and intolerable insolence in their double capacities. Wherefore the Council-General thought fit to come to the positive resolution that, from henceforward, none of the Council should be at the same time in another capacity.”

Again, in a letter to the Councillors, 13th June 1700, they say : “And the said Council-General, considering that several inconveniences and hindrances may happen in the execution of your affairs, through the too frequent changes of Presidents of your Council, have, by their Act of the 3rd instant, ordered that, upon receipt hereof, you choose a President of your own number to continue for at least six weeks, and not above three months; and that, upon the determination of that term, you choose again for the like time, and so, successively, at the determination of each term afterwards.”

proper for us; upon which they appointed Captain Thomas Drummond to oversee the work, who, according to the tools he had to work with, did beyond what could be reasonably expected from him; for our men, though for the most part in health, were generally weak for want of sufficient allowance of provisions and liquors,¹ and this inconveniency upon them was the harder by reason of the irregular serving of their scrimp allowances, for our marine masters continually pretended other urgent business, and so could hardly spare their boats to bring the land provisions and conveniences ashore, and many of the most needful things that I knew were only designed for the shore, were detained on board under pretence they belonged to the ships.

When we arrived first, we were, as it was, in a Prison for want of sloops, brigantines, or other good, stiff, windwardly vessels; for the Snow or the Pink were utterly unfit for that purpose, otherwise the sending home, as also to all our friends in the Plantations, ought to have been the first things done. The inconveniency of this was foreseen; but it seems could one of the Colony's best friends, "seized his own proper Brandy, and would not allow him any part for his own private use."

The Directors, on 10th February 1700, write to the officers of the Colony: "It's a lasting disgrace to the memory of those officers who went on the first expedition, that even the meanest planters were scandalised at the viciousness of their lives, many of them living very intemperately and viciously for many months at the public charge; whilst the most sober and industrious among them were vigilant in doing their duty. And the want of due care in an equal and moderate distribution of both provisions and liquors, but especially the latter, was none of the least causes of the misery that ensued."

In contrast with all this, it is pleasing to note that Paterson himself was an abstainer, being one of the very few Scotsmen of his day who never drank wine. Mr Bannister, his biographer, states that Paterson tried to persuade the colonists "to abstain from spirituous liquors, and the price of the allowance of Rum was to be accounted for in their favour if they would not drink it. Accordingly, among the claims for compensation, after the breaking up of the settlement, there is a formal one from a Captain Godon, on the plea of his adherence to the wise temperance pledge."

not be prevented.¹ About the twentieth of December, a sloop arrived from Jamaica, commanded by Mr Edward Sands, freighted by Captain Moon and Mr Peter Wilmot of Port Royal, and a part belonged to one Master Robert Allison, who came from aboard of Moon's sloop along with us from St Thomas Island. This sloop was consigned to Mr Allison, and in his absence to me. Upon report of her cargo, the Council ordered Captain Jolly and Captain Pinkerton to agree with Allison, which agreement was, that they should have our goods as they cost in Scotland, and we were, in lieu thereof, to have the sloop's cargo of provisions as it cost in Jamaica, and, as I remember, ten per cent advance; whereupon the sloop's provisions were put aboard one of our ships, and the goods in exchange were to be delivered by us to Captain Moon, who was expected in a month after.

Before this time, Major Cunningham, one of our number, was become so uneasy, and possessed (as we thought) by so unaccountable conceits and notions, that he gave us no small trouble, and at last would needs forsake not only his post, but also the Colony. This very justly offended the rest of the Councillors, considering their raw and unsettled circumstances; and some thoughts there were of detaining him by force. But after weighing his temper, they consented to his going; but thought it were prudent to part with him in friendship than otherwise, lest any that might espouse his humour in Scotland, should prove a means of retarding or frustrating our needful supplies. Upon these considerations, they gave him a general letter of recommendation, but no instructions in writing; and Mr Hamilton had also verbal orders to intimate the matter, but so cautiously as not thereby to prejudice the Colony's interest.

In order to cure as much as possible the convulsions we laboured under from the weight of our marine Governors, Mr Cunningham, Mr Mackay, and I agreed to try, before the Major went away, if we could persuade them to the admission of two or three new Councillors. But instead of complying with so reasonable a proposal, the three Gentlemen fell out into the greatest passion and disorder possible, and Mr Montgomery falling in with them, nothing could be done in it at that time.

Major Cunningham's going home proceeding not from the Council, but from himself. They proposed to send home a person who might by word of mouth represent to the Company things that could not be so well committed to writing. The Captains Pennicook, Pinkertoun, and Jolly, proposed Mr Hamilton; Mr Cunningham and I were for Mr Samuel Veitch; Mr Montgomery was for one Mr Alexander Baird; and Mr Mackay was non liquid. My reasons against

Mr Hamilton going away were, that he was appointed by the Company their Accountant-general, and indeed was the only person we had left fit for that and the management of the cargo, which at this time was in such disorder and confusion that I saw no way of bringing it into method but that Mr Hamilton, and such others as were capable to assist him, should go immediately about it; and thought Captain Veitch, or some other gentleman who could be better spared by the Colony, might be capable enough for that errand; whereas Mr Hamilton, his being taken from his station without supplying his place, would unavoidably reduce things to that disorder and confusion in which I am afraid the Company will find them when they come to inquire into the management of their Cargo.¹

After Mr Hamilton was dispatched in Sands his sloop by way of Jamaica, a design was set on foot to send Captain Pinkerton and Captain Malloch in the Dolphin Snow to Curasoa, Saint Thomas, and other islands, to the windward. The design was to settle a correspondence, and to buy a sloop or two, together with rum, sugar, and other things we wanted from them. But I made objections against this voyage—First, Because in our passage from Scotland we found the Snow no windwardly vessel, and the north and strong north-easterly winds were not yet over, and I questioned if anything abated, and therefore I believed (as it happened), that she would never be able to get to the windward; and, in the second place, either Pinkerton or Malloch could do anything that was to be done as well as both, whom we could not well spare by reason of our scarcity of good sea officers; and in the last place, I questioned if our present circumstances would allow of thus remote adventuring of so considerable a part of our cargo; but that it should rather lie ready by us as a bait to such as should come with present supplies, which we very much wanted at this time, and, for anything I saw, were like to want much more. But to all this I was answered in the usual form, that I did not understand it.

After Captain Pinkerton was gone Capt. Moon arrived, and on board him his owner, Mr Peter Wilmot, who called for the return of the provisions we had by Sands; when we came to offer him goods by our Invoice, he said he could buy them as cheap, if not cheaper, in Jamaica, complaining that the Invoice was not a true Invoice, but the goods were over-valued above forty per cent. However, after some clamours, the Council agreed with him for thirty pound per cent abatement upon the Invoice; yet he would not let us have any more of his provisions at that rate, but parted with us, complaining that he should be a loser. It vexed me not only to see us part with such a parcel of provisions, but also for the effect it might have to discourage others, as it afterwards happened.

As the native Indians, at our first coming, had made us several advantageous offers to undertake against the Spaniards, so now, in this month of February, they continued to alarm us with the preparations of the Spaniards, and to press us from several parts to an undertaking against them. Among these were Corbet of the Samblas, Diego of the Gulf, and Pausigo of Carreto, with others.¹

But we still answered them, that our King was at peace with the Spaniards, and so we could not make war, unless they begun with us; but whenever they did, we would repel force by force, and assemble all the Indians and others that were willing to assist us against them. They expressed a wonderful hatred and horror for the Spaniards, and seemed not to understand how we could be at peace with them, except we were as bad as they. It's certain this was the true season of the year for undertakings of that kind, and our people were then in health, and indifferent strong, which they happened not to be afterwards, when the Spaniards had given us sufficient provocation, and when the season was not so proper. But afterward, upon information that a great party of Spaniards were come overland, and from the south seas, to invade us, and were then at an Indian house two or three leagues from the other side of the harbour, we sent Mr Montgomery with a party of men to know the truth; but, instead of a body of Spaniards, found only a few men who were sent thither to get intelligence, who, when our men came upon them, took their opportunity to fire at them from the thickets where they were placed, and then run away, having killed two or three, and wounded some others. Our men returned the salute without any execution that we know of. This party consisted of twenty-five men, as we heard afterwards. This party had been detached from a body of fifteen hundred men, then at Tabugantee, and from thence designed to invade us by land; but, by reason of opposition from the Indians, and other obstructions they met with they afterward dispersed, and came to nothing.¹

¹ The skirmish with the Spaniards took place on 6th February, within the territories of the friendly Indian chief Captain Pedro. The colonists numbered 100, being a levy of 20 men from each ship, and were led by Captain James Montgomerie, one of the Councillors. Under cover of the woods the Spaniards fired two volleys of small-shot, killing two of the colonists (one of whom was Ensign Alexander Swinton) and wounding other twelve. Captain Montgomerie received a wound in the thigh.

Some days after Captain Moon was gone, returned Captain Sands from Jamaica, as also arrived one Captain Ephraim Pilkington, both laden with provisions, all which the Council bought, and sent Pilkington with his sloop or shallop to trade upon the Spanish coast, while Captain Sands went a turtling for the Colony. Some days after this, Captain Pennicook and Mr Mackay had a great falling out. I endeavoured not only to compose their difference, but, if possible, to bring some good out of it. Wherefore I represented to them separately how sad and scandalous our condition was; that if any two of us had a difference, the remainder had not authority enough to reduce them to reason: therefore advised and persuaded them both to consent to the admission of two or three new Councillors. This they severally consented to, agreeing that I should move it, and that they should be seconds; and if Messrs Montgomery and Jolly did oppose it, to carry it by vote. Accordingly, I moved it, and they did second it, but so very coldly that though Mr Jolly was in the chair, and so three against one, yet I could not so much as get my motion entered, much less a liberty to protest that the majority was for it, and so it was passed of course. This motion raised me much envy and trouble, which continued a long time after.

Before Major Cunningham went away, there was something done he would have protested against. I do not remember the thing, only that I was not of his opinion as to the matter, but was for allowing him a liberty to protest, as all other Councillors ought to have had. For this I urged the custom of most civil societies in the world, and the express meaning of the Company, when they in their instructions say that one

Councillor shall not be liable to the defaults and miscarriages of the others, but every one for his own default; but, say or do what I would, there could none of them be persuaded to it; nor was protests or entries of motions or dissents at all allowed by the old Councillors; but, indeed, that doctrine was as much exploded by the new Council as ever that of passive obedience has been upon another occasion.

About the tenth or twelfth of February, within a day or two of each other, arrived two sloops from Jamaica, the one of which was commanded by Captain Mitchell, and the other by Captain Robbins. That of Robbins was consigned to me in his absence, and Mitchell was recommended. Robbins offered his provisions as soon as ever he came in, and Mitchell would also have sold his. Their main design was about fishing the French wreck at the entrance of our harbour, of which the Council acquainted this Court, and the provisions were only brought in by the bye. Our Councillors would not be persuaded in time to take these provisions; and afterwards those purse-proud fellows, having time to understand our wants by the murmurs of the people and other circumstances, took humours in their heads, and would not part with their provisions upon any account, unless we could have given them money.

At this time, in hopes the time of the strong breeze was over, or at least much abated, we sent out the Endeavour Pink, under the command of Captain John Anderson, and a stock of some hundred pounds value on board of her, whereof Mr Robert Allison was supercargo. She was to touch at Jamaica, and go from thence to New York, and return to us with provisions; but, after she had beaten about a month, and not got forty leagues to the windward, she was forced to return to us again, after having become very leaky by the stress she had met with at sea.

About the beginning of March, Captain Pilkington returned from the coast of Carthage, having had little or no trade by reason of the badness and unsuitableness of the cargo, and brought us the unhappy news of the loss of our Snow, and the imprisonment of Captain Pinkerton and his crew at Carthage; of all which we advised the Company by one occasion of the sixth or seventh of March. Mr Mackay was then sick of an intermitting fever, and his life hardly expected; and, by reason of some heats that arose between Mr Pennicook and Mr Montgomery, all things seemed to be at a stand, for Mr Jolly and I had not authority to make peace between them when at variance, nor to cause them to keep it when made. I could think of nothing to cure this distemper of ours, but either an addition of Councillors, or a Parliament. About an addition of Councillors we could not agree, and we should lose time in staying for a Parliament: Wherefore it was resolved to call a Parliament as soon as possible;¹ and in the meantime, to dispatch the

Captains Pilkington and Sands to Carthagera, with a messenger and letter, to demand our prisoners and effects, and to declare that, if they refused, we would immediately grant reprisals; and accordingly, commissions were given to Pilkington and Sands, to be put in execution in case of refusal made, to Mr Alexander Macgie, our messenger; but Pennicook agreed not to sign these dispatches.

About this time Captain Pennicook began to be very uneasy, and to publish that there was not a month's provisions in the Colony, no not near enough to carry us off the coast, and this he published industriously upon all occasions; but, in order to put a stop to the clamours, at the first and second meeting of the Parliament, some of the members were appointed to take a narrow scrutiny of the provisions on board the several ships and ashore. This scrutiny lasted several weeks, and at last could never be very exactly taken, of which Pennicook himself (with whom concealed provisions were found) was none of the least occasions.

By this time, being about the twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth of March, Mr Mackay was pretty well recovered, and the Captains Pilkington and Sands returned from Carthagera with our messenger, Mr Alexander Macgie, who brought the refusal of our prisoners and effects, and a letter from the Governor of Carthagera to that effect.¹

were freemen so soon; they had not the true notion of liberty; the thoughts of it made them insolent and ruined command." See Appendix C.

¹ On 5th February 1699, the Dolphin Snow, commanded by Captain Pinkerton, while on a voyage from the Colony to Barbadoes to barter her cargo for provisions, struck on a

They met with, and brought in their company, a New England Brigantine, which was bound to us with provisions, but had missed our port. One Philips commanded her. Two or three days afterwards, Pilkington and Sands arrived before the harbour, Captain Moon, his sloop the Neptune, and another Jamaica sloop, commanded by one Mathias Maltman of Jamaica. Mr Wilmot sent a canoe with a letter to me about some goods he had left to be disposed of. Whether they had any other business in, I know not; but, as I was about to answer his letter, Pennicook being President, arrested the canoe, with all the men that were in her, being twelve or fourteen. The pretence was, that Moon's sloop had carried away a boy called Skelton, and all the men stopped. Nay, Moon's sloop and all his rock, and not being able to be kept afloat by baling and pumping, was run ashore under the walls of Carthagera. Believing, or pretending to believe, that they were pirates, the ship's company—30 men and a boy—were made prisoners by the Spaniards, and the ship and cargo seized. When the news of the capture reached the Council, they dispatched a messenger to the Governor of Carthagera to formally demand the release of the prisoners and restoration of the ship and cargo, and threatening reprisals in the case of refusal. When the envoy, who carried a flag of truce, delivered the Council's letter, along with a copy of the Company's Act of Parliament, the Governor treated him most contemptuously. He tore the letter and the Act in pieces, which he angrily tossed aside, stating that he would shortly make a descent upon the Scots settlement and root them out. Captain Pinkerton and his officers, after being subjected to great indignities and sufferings at Carthagera, were passed on to Spain, to be tried there as pirates. They were condemned to death, but, chiefly through the intervention of King William, were ultimately allowed to go free. The crew of the Dolphin Snow had the misfortune to be drafted into the Spanish warships in the Indies.

effects was not able to make satisfaction for this boy of Pennicook's. I did what I could to get a boat or canoe to send out, that the boy might be sent in, and the canoe released, but an embargo was laid upon every thing ; so the sloops were forced to lie off and on all night for their canoe and men ; and when I saw I could not prevail for a boat, I endeavoured to get the men out of the guardhouse. The next morning, early, Captain Pilkington went in his canoe aboard of Moon, and told him what was the matter. By him I sent a letter to Wilmot, to come ashore and justify himself. The boy Skelton was brought, and Mr Wilmot also appeared ; but instead of accusing Mr Wilmot of anything regularly, as I had reason to expect, it all ended in a little hector and Billingsgate. Mr Wilmot stayed till the afternoon ; and before he went away I came to Mr Mackay's hut, and Mr Wilmot came also to take his leave. The rest of the Councillors were then together ; and upon my coming, they called me in, and Mr Mackay presented me a paper to sign, which contained a warrant to Captain Robert Drummond to take boats and go and bring in Captain Mathias his sloop. When I asked what reasons they had for it, Mr Mackay answered, that they were informed that this sloop was a Spanish sloop, and was freighted by three Spanish merchants, now on board her, and bound for Portobello, with I know not what, for a treasure of gold and silver bars ; and added, I warrant you will not meddle, because your friend Mr Wilmot is concerned. This usage did not please me. But, however, I told them, if she was a Spanish sloop, I was as ready as they ; but, if belonging to any other nation, I would not be concerned. But, however, I signed the warrant to bring in the sloop. When she was brought, instead of a Spanish we found her a Jamaica sloop, with two Spanish passengers, and, as I heard, about 80 or 100 pounds value, in pieces of eight, Spanish pistoles, and gold dust. When I found this, I must needs say I was very angry, and endeavoured to get the sloop and men discharged next day, as being an English bottom. To this purpose, I laid the law before Pennicook, and afterwards to Mr Mackay, who by this time had brought the men and money out of the sloop. Upon this, I said I would write home about this matter, and then left them. Upon this occasion, God knows, my concern was not upon my own account, or any humour of my own, but the true love of justice and good of the Colony; in which concern of spirit, I heartily wished that they might not have cause to repent of their inhuman usage of those, before any other friendly strangers came to visit them, or to this effect. When I was gone, there was a Council called, consisting of Pennicook, Mackay, Montgomery, and Jolly, where, as the Secretary told me afterward, they confirmed the taking of the two Spaniards and the money from on board the Jamaica sloop. I suppose the minutes of the 29th or 30th of March will show it.

The Council not only bought what provisions Captain Philips had on board, and also hired his Brigantine express for Scotland; and, besides, an address to his Majesty, to lay before him our ill usage by the Spaniards, and the needful dispatches to the Company, to carry some intelligent and well-instructed person, to make a more lively representation of our circumstances to the Company. But although Mr Mackay was pretty well recovered, yet they could not at all agree upon the person to be sent. This and the like delays and interruptions occasioned another motion for an addition to the Council, in order to carry things more smoothly for the future. But upon this motion, Mr Montgomery opposed it, and then withdrew. Mr Jolly also opposed it, but continued with us till Mr Colin Campbell was named and voted, and then he likewise withdrew ; and although we sent our Secretary several times, entreating them, in a friendly and respectful manner, to give their attendance and assistance in Council, yet they refused, and altogether forsook us ; and not only so, but some small time after left the Colony.

After the admission of Mr Colin Campbell, Mr Samuel Veitch, Mr Charles Forbes, and Mr Thomas Drummond, we proceeded to transmit the address to his Majesty, and the other needful dispatches to the Company ; and Mr Daniel Mackay was pitched upon to be the person should carry them, who was parted from us the tenth or eleventh of April last.

Upon the return from the Governor of Carthagena, we began to think of undertaking something considerable against the Spaniards ; but the rainy season then approaching, together with the sickness of some, and the general weakness and rawness of our men, made it impracticable at this time by land, wherefore the ships were ordered to be in readiness ; and in the meantime, Pilkington and Sands were ordered to cruise upon the coast of Portobello, to take what they could by way of reprisal ; as also what prisoners they could light upon, for intelligence, guides, and pilots.¹

Within twelve or fourteen days, Pilkington and Sands returned without any prize but one, that of a sloop they found riding at anchor at the Samblas, without anybody in her; nor did anybody appear, although there were many guns fired, and almost two days spent, expecting some of her crew, or other intelligence who she belonged unto. At last they brought her away, as thinking her to belong to some pirates we heard were upon the coast, who might have been gone out upon some land expedition in their canoes.

Pilkington and Sands also acquainted us of their receipt of letters from Jamaica by a sloop they met with at sea, by which they were very much threatened for engaging with us, and upon this desired to be paid what we owed them, in order to return home. We gave them such goods as we had, and as much to their satisfaction as possible; but, after all, there remained a balance of more than a hundred pounds sterling to Captain Pilkington, and above twenty pounds to Captain Sands. They parted with us the twentieth day of April; and Captain Pilkington promised, as soon as he arrived, to send us a sloop with provisions, and, as soon as he could, would follow after with his family and effects. In the meantime, there was a plot to run away with the ship the Saint Andrew discovered, and that several persons were suspected to have a hand therein. I had then some fits of an intermitting fever; but, however, I put force upon myself as much as possible to be present in the Councils, lest some rash act should be committed, or an innocent man should suffer. After all, it was found to be the melancholy discourses of three or four fellows, who, among others, were miserably harassed by Pennicook's unequal government on board.

Our men did not only continue daily to grow more weakly and sickly, but more, without hopes of recovery; because, about the latter end of the month of April, we found several species of the little provisions we had left in a manner utterly spoiled and rotten; but under these our very unsupportable difficulties, it was no small ease and satisfaction to the Colony to find their Sea-Commanders reduced to reason, and their Counsellors become so unanimous, patient, and prudent, by whom the doctrines of non-protesting and non-admission were exploded with disdain, and any former misunderstandings, irregularities, or disrespectful carriage to one another in the old Council, were now become as so many lessons of warning to the new, by which there was much contentment, and few or no grumblings among the people, as every one expected with patience the arrival of good news, and the needful recruits from the mother country, to make way for happy days and glorious success to come, which the good and hopeful condition of their government seemed to be no small pledge of.

Towards the beginning of May, there arrived a French sloop from Petit Guavas, with a letter from the Governor Du Cass about the before-mentioned French wreck. One Captain Tristian commanded this sloop, and one Du Cass was as supercargo aboard of goods for the Spanish coast. They made some stay about the wreck; and before we received the unhappy news of the proclamations, they sailed for Portobello. This Captain Tristian had, some years ago, by shipwreck upon this coast, been forced to live a great while among the Indians, and to go naked as they. He spoke the language, and admired this country for healthfulness, fruitfulness, and riches, above all other in the Indies, and said he would come and reside among us, and doubted not but above five hundred of the French from Hispaniola would soon be with us. He told us this country was reckoned by those who had tried the difference much more healthful than Hispaniola, or any of the American Islands, so that several French who knew it, began to use the coming from Hispaniola in trading or fishing sloops to recover their healths; and of this he had experience several times, and now even at present, though it was the sickly season for new comers. He said, there is such a thing as a more sickly time of the year than others in all countries, and the season here was from April or May to September, and then all that had any means to do it would recover. He would take the first opportunity to write us the news, and the true state of the Spaniards from Portobello.

Upon the third day of May we despatched the sloop brought in by Pilkington and Sands to Jamaica with money and other effects, in order to purchase provisions and necessaries for the Colony. Of her design we had given a hint to Captain Pilkington before he went away, the better to be in readiness to freight her when she should arrive. Mr Henry Patton had the command of this sloop, and Mr Alexander Burnet was to manage any negotiation ashore. Then we began to expect these two sloops, viz. that of Pilkington's, and this from Jamaica; also, that other supplies would be dropping in till a reinforcement should come from our country; when, instead thereof, upon the eighteenth day of May, a periagua of ours returned from the coast of Carthagena, which had met with a Jamaica sloop, by whom she had the surprising news, that proclamations were published against us in Jamaica, wherein it was declared, that by our settlement at Darien, we had broken the peace entered into with his Majesty's allies, and therefore prohibited all his Majesty's subjects from supplying or holding any sort of correspondence with us, upon the severest penalties;¹ and it seems the

“By the Honourable Sir WILLIAM BEESTON, Kt., His Majesty’s Lieutenant-Governor and Commandant-in-Chief in and over this his Island of Jamaica, and over the territories depending thereon in America, and Vice-Admiral of the same.

“A PROCLAMATION.

“WHEREAS I have received commands from His Majesty, by the Right Honourable James Vernon Esquire, one of His Majesty’s principal Secretaries of State, signifying to me that His Majesty is unacquainted with the intentions and designs of the Scots settling at Darien; and that it is contrary to the peace entered into with His Majesty’s Allies, and therefore has commanded me that no assistance be given them. These are, therefore, in His Majesty’s name and by command, strictly to command His Majesty’s subjects, whatsoever, that they do not presume, on any pretence whatsoever, to hold any correspondence with the said Scots, nor to give them any assistance of arms, ammunition, provisions, or any other necessaries whatsoever, either by themselves or any other for them; or by any of their vessels, or of the English nation, as they will answer the contempt of His Majesty’s command to the contrary, at their utmost peril. Given under my hand and seal of arms this 8th day of April, 1699, and in the eleventh year of our Sovereign Lord William the Third of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland King, and of Jamaica, Lord Defender of the Faith, etc.

WILLIAM BEESTON.”

The instructions to the Colonial Governors to issue the proclamations were sent secretly from England. The insincerity of the English Government in the affair is evidenced

Governor of Jamaica had been so hasty and precipitant in this matter, that these proclamations were published upon the Sabbath day (the like whereof had not been formerly known). But it was to prevent the going out of two sloops bound out next morning, and freighted with provisions for Caledonia. This sloop also reported, it was rumoured at Jamaica, that the Company had asked some thing or other, they knew not what; but only, that it was unanimously rejected by the Parliament of Scotland. This I could not believe; yet the report thereof, at this juncture, did us a great deal of harm, and added to the disorder people were in about by the fact that, in September 1697, the Board of Trade, reported that Darien had never been possessed by the Spaniards; and they recommended that the territory be seized for the Crown of England with "all possible dispatch, lest the Scotch Company be there before us, which is of the utmost importance to the trade of England." This resulted in Captain Long being sent out in the Rupert Prize, but on arrival he found the place in possession of the colonists.

After the collapse of the Darien enterprise, the Scots attributed its failure mainly to the Colonial proclamations forbidding intercourse with the settlement, and blamed the English Government accordingly. But, as De Foe says in his 'History of the Union,' if the colonists had been provided either with money or letters of credit, they could not have failed to obtain supplies. When the colonists retired from Darien they met at sea a New England ship with provisions, bound for the Colony; and when the Unicorn arrived at New York, Paterson says they were informed "that some sloops and vessels were gone to Caledonia, and a great many more, notwithstanding all prohibition, were following after." As it was, in the month of February—two months before the proclamations came out—two sloops freighted with provisions, from Jamaica, returned thither again without breaking bulk, as they would not part with their provisions upon any account unless they received money in exchange.

the proclamations; and it seemed impossible to stay them for above a week at most. Although, considering our low and distressed condition for want of supplies, the prohibiting the King's English subjects from trading, or so much as corresponding with us, was very discouraging, yet the declaring we had broken the peace, and, by consequence, proclaiming us pirates, before we had been once heard, or summoned to answer, so very contrary to the usual proceeding even in case of real piracy, was most of all surprising, and became the general occasion of people concluding, that the long silence of our country proceeded from no other cause but that they were brow-beaten out of it, and durst not so much as send word to us to shift for ourselves. Upon these and the like apprehensions every one more than others began to be in haste to be gone. When I saw there was no talking against our leaving the place, I persuaded them what I could, that first rumours of things of this nature were always most terrifying, and that happily our native country knew nothing of all this. If they would not go, but remained firm to the design, there was none of us but would afterward be ashamed of our precipitant forwardness in going away upon this occasion; therefore I desired them not to design, or so much as talk of going away; but only, since our landsmen were so ill, that they were no more in condition to defend the fort, that they might embark some or all of the best things on board the several ships, as places of greater security, and if we must leave the harbour, nay, the coast, that we should think of it only by precaution, and even return when we should be at sea, if we met with any news or supplies from Scotland, which I did not doubt of our meeting with, if we did not make too much haste. This they seemed to agree to, but not by any means to lose time in going out; but although they had agreed the contrary, yet it was immediately among the people and strangers with us that we had resolved to desert the place. From that time, all I could pretend to, was only to contrive lets and stumbling-blocks to the proceedings. Another thing I thought upon was, if our sloop arrived from Jamaica, to stay with twenty-five or thirty men upon the coast, and live upon turtling and fishing for some time, till we should see if any recruits, or news, came from Scotland. This I imparted to Captain Thomas Drummond, who seemed most concerned at our leaving the place. He seemed very well pleased with the proposal, if it could be reduced to practice, with only this difference, that I should go to Scotland, in order to represent some things of moment to the Company, and he stay in my place on the coast. But our sloop not coming from Jamaica before our going away, as also the almost universal falling down of our men, and wanting means to recover them, rendered this design of staying upon the coast impracticable.

About ten days before we went away, arrived another French sloop, who said she came last from Carthagená, and told us, the new governor, so long expected, was arrived from Spain about three weeks before, and had made the old governor and most of the officers prisoners, for yielding up that town to Pointia. They also pretended there were four French men-of-war on the coast, and that the Spaniards were making great and speedy preparations against us. They had no sort of goods aboard, and were by us suspected for spies. Indeed, one of the two gentlemen in her seemed not unfit for that purpose. What their names were, my sickness gave me not leave to know, but we left them in the harbour when we came away; before which, we received a letter from Captain Tristian at Portobello, wherein he gave us the whole state of the Spanish preparations, with his conjectures that they would not be ready against us in less than four months. He concluded with his hearty wishes that the Scots fleet might be with us before that time came.

About the 5th of June, I was taken very ill of a fever; but trouble of mind, as I afterwards found, was none of the least causes thereof.¹ By the 9th or 10th of June, all the Councillors, and most of the officers, with their baggage, were on board the several ships, and I left alone on shore in a weak condition. None visited me except Captain Thomas Drummond, who, with me, still lamented our thoughts of leaving the place, and praying God that we might but hear from our country before we left the coast. But others were in so great haste, that all the guns in the fort, at least those belonging to the Saint Andrew, had been left behind, but for the care and vigilance of Captain Thomas Drummond.

In my sickness, besides the general concern of my spirits, I was much troubled about a report spread abroad of Captain Pennicook, as designing to run away with the ship, on pretence that we were proclaimed pirates, and should be all hanged when we came home, or at least the Company would never pay the seamen their wages. In my small intervals of ease I would fain have had a council, and Pennicook come on shore, to inquire and take order about this report, and if any truth were in it to have secured him on board another ship. But I could not get them to me by reason of illness, at least pretended illness in some, and I was not able to go to them.

June the 16th. As I remember, I was brought on board the Unicorn in a great hurry, they pretending they would sail next morning; and they seemed to be in so great haste, that I apprehended they would hardly stay for one another, as afterwards it happened.¹ My things were that night some of them put on board, some of them left behind and lost, and almost all of them damaged and wet, which afterwards rotted most of them. Among the rest were lost several brass kettles of my own, and sixteen iron pots belonging to Mr Wilmot of Jamaica. There also remained due to me from the Colony about seventy-two pounds sterling, for which they had sugar, tobacco, rosin, and other things for the use of the ships and men ashore, and for which I was promised money or effects immediately. But my sickness prevented my getting the balance of that account then, and it remains yet due to me. But the worst is, it belonged almost all to other people.

I think it was upon the 18th of June that the Caledonia got under sail, and the Unicorn followed. Both warped out beyond the Black Rock; but had like to have been lost in the night by a squall of wind, or a tornado; and for want of hands the Unicorn lost one of her anchors and longboat. The Saint Andrew set sail next day, and was as forward as any of them. The Unicorn lost the wind by endeavouring to recover her longboat, and was forced to come to an anchor under Golden Island, where she rode in no small danger; but it pleased God there were no squalls of wind. That night the Caledonia and Pink were quite out of sight; but the Saint Andrew came to an anchor about two leagues, as I guess, towards the north-west of us. Next day, being the 20th, we saw none of the ships, and, for want of hands, were forced to cut, to get clear of that unhappy place where we rode, and so lost another of our anchors.

Upon the 18th, as we were warping out, Captain Thomas Drummond came on board, and acquainted us that Captain Veitch and he had met twice on board the Saint Andrew with Pennicook and Campbell; and that he was now come from the last meeting, whereat they had resolved upon leaving the place, and that they had agreed to touch at New England to get provisions. Captain Drummond also offered me two papers to sign. I was very ill, and not willing to meddle. But he pressed it, saying there could be no quorum without me; because four Councillors must sign the instructions to the two aboard of each ship. Upon this I signed them. They contained, as I remember, the one an order to the several captains to keep company with one another, and to go for Boston or Salem in New England, and the other was an order to the two Councillors on board each ship, or the survivor of them, in case of separation, to dispose of such of the cargo as they could, and after supplying the several ships with provisions, to carry what remained to Scotland for the Company's use. He said he would see me next day, but I saw him no more till we met at New York.

That day we parted from Golden Island, we met with the sloop commanded by Patton, from Jamaica. She could get nothing there because of the proclamations, of which she had procured a copy, not knowing we had received it before. Next night we sprung our main-topmast, yet got it mended next day. A night or two after we lost all our masts, except the main and mizzen, by a squall of wind and want of hands to the sails. This was not all. The leaks of our ship, that were great before, increased to that degree that we were hardly able to keep her above water. Next day we saw the Saint Andrew, about two leagues distance. She could see our distressed condition, but came not near us. It was calm all day, and had she sent her boat, we had been able to recover most of our sails, rigging, and other useful things, which for want of this were utterly lost. In the afternoon we fired guns for her, upon which she came nearer, but lay by at half a league distance. Our captain, Mr Anderson, went on board Pennicook, and besought his help; but he utterly refused, only at the entreaty of some of the gentlemen on board he was prevailed upon to give an order for the sloop to attend our ship till she saw what should become of us. Next day the wind served, whereupon the Saint Andrew set sail, leaving us in this miserable condition. The sloop continued by us all next night; but, notwithstanding her orders in writing, and Patton's repeated oaths to Captain Anderson, that he would not leave us, they sailed away from us next day at fair daylight, after Abraham Loudon had secretly conveyed himself and his baggage into the sloop's canoe, and so on board her.¹

¹ On 10th February 1700 the Directors of the Company wrote: "This Patton was master of the sloop which was sent over to Jamaica from our Colony in May last for provisions. In his return, he met our ships at sea, and was commanded to attend the Unicorn, then in great distress; but was so far from doing it, that he ran away with said sloop, and when he came to Jamaica, disposed of her and her cargo, and applied the money got for them to his own use and such as were with him." Following upon this, after the death of Captain Pennicook, and of Captain Campbell, his successor, Patton managed to get the charge of the St Andrew, while she lay at Port Royal, and in his capacity of caretaker he appears again to have betrayed the trust reposed in him by his employers.

Abraham Loudon, who is stated above to have secretly conveyed himself on board of Patton's sloop, returned to Scotland, where he became a lieutenant in the Town Guard of Edinburgh. He was put under examination by the Court of Directors on 18th January 1700, and admitted that he had agreed with Patton to dispose of the sloop and cargo, he receiving £30 sterling as his share of the proceeds, besides some provisions. He, however, alleged that he duly acquainted Paterson, as well as the captain of the Unicorn, of his intention of going on board the sloop,

At this time we had only five or six seamen to a watch, and most of these none of the best neither ; and there were about twenty landmen able to move, who had enough to do by perpetual pumping to keep the ship above water. However, the few men we had went to work, and in about a week's time got up jury masts of such stuff as we had left ; and then setting sail, we were not able to recover Jamaica. On July 25th we made the Bay of Mattanzas, upon Cuba, when Captain Forbes died. The 26th, our captain went in his pinnace into the bay ; but instead of water, found a Spanish fort of twenty or twenty-four guns, and never saw it till under its command. Then, by an inadvertency, Mr Spence, our linguist, stepped on shore to some Spaniards, who handed him. After they had gotten him, they endeavoured to secure the boat by commanding it with their guns and small arms ; but in case that would not do, by manning a periagua after her. Our men, perceiving their delays and preparations, took their opportunity to get away. They were shot at several times, and pursued by the periagua, but were so happy as to escape. In the meantime, the ship escaped narrowly running ashore for want of hands.

That evening we set sail from the Mattanzas, and after likewise running great hazard of shipwreck on the coast of Virginia, where, August the 7th, we struck several times.

to which, he said, no objection was raised. Paterson, who happened to be in Edinburgh at the time of this inquiry, was called and interrogated on the point, and stated that he was positive that Loudon never spoke to him on the subject. The Directors thereon reported, "We have many other reasons which induce us to believe that Loudon is disingenuous."

We arrived at Sandy - Hook, near New York, the 13th, and at New York the 14th of August last; under God, owing the safety of the ship and our lives to the care and industry of our commander, Captain John Anderson.

When we were come to New York, we were much concerned to find so universal an inclination, in all sorts of people, who seemed to regret our leaving the place more than we; and, by our friends, we then understood that some sloops and vessels were gone to Caledonia, and a great many more, notwithstanding all prohibitions, were following after, if the unhappy account of our unfortunate leaving the place had not stopped them.

In our voyage from the Colony to New York, we lost near 150 of about 250 persons put on board, most of them for want of looking after, and of means to recover them.¹ In that condition we had no small loss and inconvenience by the sickness and death of Mr Hector Mackenzie, our chief chirurgion. He died off Cape

Of the 1200 men who sailed from Leith in these vessels, 44 died on the voyage to Darien; about 300 found a grave during the Colony's short stay there; and more than 400 were thrown overboard in the fatal "middle passage" between Darien and Jamaica and New York. Many more died in Jamaica, while others got dispersed in that island and in Cuba and America. Very few lived to return to their native land.

St Antonio, July the 12th, of a distemper wholly, or in a great measure, contracted by his unwearied pains and industry among the people on shore, as well as on board, for many weeks together, when there was hardly any other willing, if able, or at least capable of helping them.

The ship Caledonia was about ten days at New York before us, where, when I arrived, I was brought so very low, by my distempers and troubles of mind, that for some time my life was not expected. In the meanwhile, a transaction was made with Messrs Wenham and De Lancie, by Mr Samuel Veitch and Mr Thomas Drummond, in order to fit out a sloop to return to the Colony, and supply the ship Caledonia with provisions for Scotland. My indisposition disabled me from meddling. But Captain Robert Drummond can give a larger account of that matter, as having been concerned in the whole course of that affair with the aforesaid two Councillors. About the 18th of September Captain Thomas Drummond was dispatched back to the Colony, in a sloop, with arms, ammunition, provisions, working tools, and orders to see and re-settle the place, if the supplies from Scotland were come up.

Before Captain Thomas Drummond went away we had received the Company's letter of the 22nd April, by way of New England; but had only flying reports, without any certainty, of what recruits were sailed from Scotland. Only they seemed all to conclude that some Scots ships were passed by the Leeward Islands, which we supposed to be Captains Jameson and Stark, after we had received yours of the 25th of June, the day before we sailed.

Some days before I parted from New York, Mr Samuel Veitch acquainted me that he designed to stay there this winter, and that, in the meantime, he would look after the effects put ashore to satisfy Messrs Wenham and De Lancie. By that means he would be in readiness to go back to the Colony, when he should receive the Company's orders. I would have spoken with him about this matter more at large, but his sudden going aboard the ship, then lying six leagues off, prevented me; nor did I see him till I came on board, when I found him determined to stay behind us.

October 12. We set sail in the ship Caledonia from Sandy-Hook, near New York, and after a tempestuous, stormy passage, although but little contrary winds, we made the west coast of Ireland, Saturday, November 11th, and by reason of the mists and currents, we were in great danger off the rocks of Ferney, November 13th, about ten at night. After that, the wind coming short and exceeding stormy, after no small danger, we were obliged to come to an anchor at the northerly entrance of the Sound of Isla; and there we rode it out in most violent storms till Monday, 20th November, when we got into the Sound, and came to an anchor in a safe place and smooth water; under God, owing our safety and that of the ship to the great vigilancy and industry of our commander, Robert Drummond.

Upon the ship's arrival in the Sound, Captain Drummond immediately dispatched Captains William Murray and Laurence Drummond express to Edinburgh, to acquaint the Company with our arrival. Next morning, being Tuesday the 21st of November, in company with Captain John Campbell, I parted in a boat for the mainland, and from thence, by easy journeys and some stops, by reason of indisposition, I arrived here in Edinburgh, Tuesday, December the 5th inst.—I am, Right Honourable, your most humble and most obedient servant, WILLM. PATERSON.

After giving in his Report, Paterson remained in Scotland for a time, and was again taken into the confidence of the Directors. He generously gave them the benefit of his assistance and advice in their difficulties, and their subsequent dispatches to the Colony bear evidence that they adopted his suggestions,—now, however, too late. Although the events which transpired in Darien after Paterson so reluctantly retired from it form no part of his life story, it may be useful to give a brief account of them for the purpose of completing the unhappy narrative of the ill-fated scheme. In connection with the first expedition, it should be mentioned that, when the surviving settlers were in the act of abandoning the Colony in June 1699, two auxiliary ships, the Olive Branch, Captain William Jameson, commander, and the Hopeful Binning of Bo'ness, Captain Alexander Stark,¹ commander, were on their way from Scotland to Darien with 300 additional settlers and a large supply of stores. These vessels sailed from Leith on 12th May 1699, and reached Caledonia Bay about the middle of August, having, it is stated, one death only during the voyage. On arriving at their destination, they were greatly surprised to find the settlement deserted and the colonists gone, they knew not whither. They resolved, however, to remain in the harbour and await the coming of the larger expedition, consisting of the Rising Sun and her three companion ships. But within a few days after their arrival a serious disaster took place, which necessitated a change in their arrangements. This was the loss of the Olive Branch, which was burned down to the water's edge, along with its cargo of provisions. The fire arose through the carelessness of one of the stewards, who had gone to the hold with a lighted candle to draw brandy. All the men on board (100) were safely transferred to the Hopeful Binning. Being now rendered incapable of staying at the place through the loss of their provisions, the intending settlers withdrew in the Hopeful Binning and sailed away to Jamaica, where a great mortality befell them, most of them dying there.¹ Prior to this, on 24th February, his wife, petitioned to be left behind to await the arrival of the larger expedition. Their request was agreed to, and a supply of provisions was given to them. They lived with the friendly and hospitable Indians until the arrival of the Rising Sun's party, whom they joined in good health and spirits.

CHAPTER VII.

THE EXPEDITIONS TO DARIEN.

SECOND EXPEDITION.

UNFORTUNATE as had been the first attempt to colonise Darien, the second proved even more disastrous still.

Intelligence of the great calamity that had befallen the first expedition had not yet (August 1699) reached Scotland. The Directors and stockholders of the Company were still in the fond belief that all was going on well, and the public generally were on the qui vive for further good news from the Colony. Doggerel poets were singing the praises of the venture. A broadsheet, entitled "A Poem upon the Undertaking of the Royal Company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies," was sold by James Wardlaw, at his shop in the Parliament Close, Edinburgh. One stanza thus eulogised Paterson :

“Admire the steady soul of Paterson ;
It is no common genius can persuade
A Nation bred in War, to think of Trade.”

While another verse referred to the institution of the “ open door ”—

“This Company designs a Colony
To which all mankind freely may resort,
And find quick justice in an Open Port.”

A patriotic “Lady of Honour,” whose name is not given, also composed a song specially in connection with the departure of the second expedition. It was entitled “The Golden Island, or the Darien Song, in commendation of all concerned in that noble Enterprise of the Valiant Scots.” This ditty was sold at John Reid’s printing-house in Bell’s Wynd, Edinburgh. In addition to a florid description of the springs, rivulets, flowers, and singing-birds of Darien, the honourable lady gave a generous forecast of the dividends that might be looked for by the stockholders on their investment—

“All men that has put in some Stock
To us where we are gone,
They may expect our Saviour’s words,
A hundred reap for one ;
For to encourage every one
That ventures on the Main.”

Meanwhile the Company were not idle in Edinburgh. Acting on the recommendation contained in the Council's letter of 28th December 1698, the Directors resolved to despatch the second expedition from the Clyde, in place of from Leith Roads, so as to avoid "the danger, as well as the tediousness, of the passage North-About."

Accordingly, a fleet of four ships of force was fitted out, consisting of—

The Rising Sun (Commodore) .		Captain James Gibson, commander (60 guns).
The Hope		Captain James Miller, commander.
The Duke of Hamilton .		Captain Walter Duncan, do.
The Hope of Bo'ness .		Captain Richard Dalling, do.

The first two ships were owned by the Company, the other two being chartered; and they carried about 1300 men, together with a large supply of arms, ammunition, provisions, liquors, and other necessities. Four councillors were appointed to the expedition—viz., James Byres, Captain James Gibson, Captain William Veitch, and Major John Lindsay, whose powers were to cease on reaching Caledonia and so coming within the jurisdiction of the old Council.

Although ready to sail on the 18th of August 1699, the ships were detained in the Clyde by contrary winds for over a month, this unfortunate delay entailing a corresponding encroachment on their stock of provisions. On the eve of sailing, some flying rumours of the abandonment of the settlement reached Edinburgh. On the 22nd of September, immediately on hearing these reports, the Directors despatched an express to the fleet with instructions to further delay their departure, even "though the wind should prove fair," until the arrival of Mr Daniel Mackay, one of the councillors attached to the first expedition, who was at this time visiting Scotland on the Company's business, and with whom they proposed to send fresh instructions based on his recent experiences in Darien. But the council on board the Rising Sun, being suspicious that this message meant their recall, instantly resolved to depart. The express reached them at 10 o'clock on Saturday night, and they set sail at 9 o'clock next morning without hoisting their "Blue Peter," or waiting for some provisions which they had ordered, or for the men whom they had sent to bring the provisions off. The Rev. Francis Borland, one of the ministers on board the fleet, in his Diary, says: "September 24th, 1699, the Lord's Day, we set sail, being four ships in company, from Rothesay, in the Isle of Bute, and steered along through St George's Channel." Three months afterwards, the council sent home the lame excuse for their sudden departure that the countermand-ing orders proceeded from three Directors only, whereas their original sailing orders were given by the whole Court.

The ships had a favourable passage as regards wind and weather, but much sickness prevailed among the men, about 160 dying on the voyage. On 9th November the fleet stood before the island of Montserrat, where Councillor Byres landed in quest of water, some fresh provisions, and the latest news; but the governor of the island refused to give any supplies, stating that he was acting in conformity with orders which he had received from the Court of England. While in the island, Byres heard rumours about the desertion of the Colony, and when writing to the Directors next day regarding these rumours, he said: "We shall see ere we believe, and either knit on the old thrum or begin a new web; and I'm persuaded all on board will do their utmost endeavour to maintain the honour of the Nation and interest of the Company." These expressions of loyal service gave great satisfaction to the Directors at home. On 30th November the four ships arrived safely in Caledonia harbour, and the sinister rumours in circulation at Montserrat were unfortunately confirmed. The settlement was found to be deserted, the huts burned, the fort demolished, and the ground that had been cleared all overgrown with shrubs and weeds. A general outcry was now made in the ships to be taken back to Scotland without landing. Two small sloops with provisions were lying in the harbour at the time of their arrival. The one was under Captain Thomas Drummond, one of the councillors of the first Colony, who had come from New York, in company with some survivors of the first expedition, with a supply of provisions and working implements to assist in resettling the place. His sloop had been lying in the harbour for eight days. The other was under Mr Fulton from New England. From these gentlemen the newcomers learned what had become of the first Colony, whither they had gone, and how they had fared in Darien.

Shortly after arrival a meeting of councillors and land and sea officers was held to determine whether or not they should settle in the place. When they came to a vote, it was carried in the affirmative. Councillors Byres and Lindsay were averse to settling, and discouraged it from the first; Gibson was indifferent; Veitch alone resolutely advocating that a landing be made, in which he was strongly backed by Captain Drummond. When Captain Drummond went on board the Rising Sun on its arrival in the harbour, he found Byres "in a strange consternation by reason of the former Colony's being gone," and maintaining that "they were not come to settle a Colony, but to have reinforced one." Byres used all his efforts to hinder a successful settlement. At the same time, this masterful man took upon himself the command of the Colony, and swayed the majority of the Council, from whose deliberations Captain Drummond was excluded by a mere quibble. Although the fleet had provisions for six months, Byres gave it out that they had a supply for six weeks only. Further, at his instigation the Council resolved that all the men beyond 500 should be sent to Jamaica, to be "disposed of" there. This announcement caused much alarm and grumbling among the settlers. They were not informed who were to be sent away, and it was bruited among them that they were to be sold as slaves to the planters in Jamaica. This had the effect of paralysing their efforts, "every one saying, what reason had they to work or build huts for others, they not knowing whether they were to stay or go." In fact, Byres so managed it that little real work was done until the Spaniards appeared at sea. Nine of the settlers ran away with an eight-oared boat belonging to the Rising Sun. "Nine Villains," as Byres and his fellow-councillors called them; "none of them are yet returned, albeit it be 14 days since they deserted." A plot was also discovered to make prisoners of the councillors and seize the two largest ships. This led to a council of war being held on board the Rising Sun, which resulted in one of the settlers, Alexander Campbell, being sentenced to death, the execution being carried out on 20th December within Fort St Andrew.

Information reached the settlement at this time that the Spaniards were busy preparing to attack the Colony. At this juncture Captain Drummond gave in a written proposal to the Council offering to relieve them of 150 men, with whom he would attack Portobello, and thus forestall the Spanish movement. His letter is as follows :—

" Aboard the Anna of Caledonia, 15th December 1699.

"TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE COUNCIL OF CALEDONIA.

"Whereas I am sensible that one half of the men that is come from Scotland is to be sent to Jamaica, I therefore desire that you would allow one hundred and fifty that would be willing to take their fate with me, you allowing them three weeks' provision, which was condescended on to carry them off; likewise allowing arms and ammunition; and they shall not be burdensome to the Colony, till it is in a condition to maintain them. The reason of my pressing this now is, that I'm invited by several captains of the Indians that will raise their men, and undertake that which may be advantageous not only to the party, but for the relief of what prisoners the Spaniards have of ours; and if you will grant my desire, you would condescend on it speedily, and give orders for the reviewing of what was brought in the sloop; and in so doing you will oblige.

—R.H., Your most humble servant,

“THOMAS DRUMMOND.”

Drummond's proposal was rejected by Byres and the other councillors as chimerical. In the 'Darien Papers,' p. 233, it is stated "that Mr Byres particularly said, 'They were not come to take towns,'" and "that at last it became a byword, that whoever seemed to be against Mr Byres' measures, was by him said to be one of those who were for the taking of towns." Byres, who was jealous of Drummond, ill-used the sailors of his sloop, so that they were obliged to shift among the natives, with whom they continued until they were brought off by an English ship sometime after the fort had been surrendered to the Spaniards. He even went the length of placing Drummond under arrest, and keeping him close prisoner for six weeks on board the Duke of Hamilton. This was until the arrival of Captain Campbell of Finab, Drummond's comrade and fellow-officer in the Earl of Argyle's regiment in Flanders, who demanded his release.

Notwithstanding that Byres discouraged the planting, the Council, in their letter of 3rd

February 1700, reported that they had erected a number of huts and two storehouses, and hoped in a few days to have the fort tolerably repaired. At this time intelligence was brought to Byres that the Spaniards were marching on the settlement; but he professed to scout the idea, and boasted that he would undertake to fight all the Spaniards who might come forward.

The Council's dispatches to headquarters were also most discouraging, complaining of spoiled provisions, bad beef and flour, and that their cargo did not contain £50 of vendible goods. They also wrote, "We cannot conceive for what end so much thin gray paper and so many little blue bonnets were sent here, being entirely useless, and not worth their room in a ship."

In a second report submitted by Paterson to the Directors after his return to Scotland, wherein he gives a full description of the soil and climate of Darien, he specially refers to the abundance of gold, and gives specific details of the various gold mines in the Isthmus. But on this subject Byres and his fellow-councillors write on 23rd December 1699: "That which was called Gold dust is indeed very thick here, particularly at our watering place, in and about the water, but it proves really nothing at all but slimy stuff, verifying the proverb, 'Tis not all Gold that glisters.'" The value of this report may be judged from a written statement by Captain Drummond to the Directors, in which he affirms that during the whole time that Byres was located at Caledonia "he had not been a pistol-shot from the shoreside, so that he could not be capable to give any account of the situation and soil of the place."

Alarming reports were now being brought in daily by the friendly Indians from all quarters that the Spaniards were coming across the hills with a large force, and that several Spanish war-ships were on the way from Portobello to attack the settlement. Byres reiterated his disbelief in these reports, but nevertheless, on February 7th, he found it convenient to get out of the way by taking passage to Jamaica, ostensibly for the purpose of arranging for supplies and for the reception of the men in excess of 500 who were to be transported from the settlement against their wishes; and although he made a feint of returning to Darien, he never did so.¹

¹ Mr Byres and Captain Drummond both lived to return to Scotland. In 1701 an inquiry was made into their conduct in the Colony by a committee of Directors of the Company, who examined as witnesses officers and others who had returned from Darien. The committee reported that Captain Drummond's conduct had been generous and honourable, and that he had made several good proposals, both for the honour of the nation and the interest of the Company, and that Byres and his fellow-councillors had treated him in "a barbarous, unnatural, and unjust" manner. In regard to Byres, they further reported that

The Rev. Alexander Shields, one of the Presbyterian ministers attached to the Colony, writing at this time (21st February), says :—

“ Our sickness did so increase (above 220 at the same time in fevers and fluxes), and our pitiful rotten provisions were found to be so far exhausted, that we were upon the very point of leaving and losing this Colony. Orders were actually given to provide wood and water with all expedition to carry us all off, which drove me almost to the brink of despair, and to thinking of a resolution to stay behind with anybody that would venture, among the Indians. But in our greatest darkness, light appeared.”

The temporary gleam of sunshine referred to by Mr Shields had reference to the unexpected arrival, on the 11th of February, of Captain Alexander Campbell of Finab in a sloop from Barbadoes. This brave and tried soldier had been appointed by the Directors as a councillor and commander of the Colony, and he brought fresh dispatches and a much wanted they were of opinion that he had “ not only violated the trust reposed in him by the Company to an extraordinary degree, but was also guilty of several unwarrantable, arbitrary, illegal, and inhumane actings and practices highly injurious to the parties concerned, and manifestly tending to the great and irretrievable loss of the Company and Colony, and to the dishonour of the nation ; and that he ought to be prosecuted for the same.” Byres, shortly thereafter, retired to the Continent, where he attempted, but without success, to vindicate his conduct in ‘ A Letter to a Friend at Edinburgh from Rotterdam : Giving an Account of the Scots Affairs in Darien. By James Byres.’ Printed, 1702.

supply of provisions. His coming was timeous and welcome to the colonists in their great straits, and his presence raised their drooping spirits. By his advice they recalled the body of settlers who had embarked for Jamaica, and whose ships were still lying in the harbour, their repeated attempts to get out of the Bay having been frustrated by contrary winds.

On the 13th of February, two days after Captain Campbell's arrival, the Indians brought intelligence that a party of Spaniards were encamped within three days' journey of the settlement. On learning this, Captain Campbell advised an immediate attack on the enemy in their camp, and he cheerfully offered himself as leader. His advice was taken, and a party of 200 men allowed him. He was supported by Lieutenant Robert Turnbull, who led the van with over 40 Indians and 3 of their captains or chiefs. Turnbull was a loyal officer of the Company, who had been one of the first Colony, and understood something of the Indian language. After a toilsome march for three days, through woods and over high hills, they came upon the Spanish camp, entrenched behind a strong barricade, at a place called Toubocanti. Several rounds having been fired by the colonists, Campbell gave the order to attack, and with a huzza led the way, sword in hand. His hatchetmen swiftly cut down the palisadoes, and in the strenuous assault which followed, the Indian levies specially signalised themselves. The Spaniards fled in confusion, leaving their dead and wounded; but night intervening, the pursuit was not continued any distance. The colonists had nine men killed and about fourteen wounded: among the latter were Captain Campbell and Lieutenant Turnbull, who were both wounded in the shoulder, and Pedro, one of the Indian captains — the last-mentioned severely. Included in the booty which they brought away was the equipage and coat of the Spanish commander, Don Michael de Cordonnez, which bore in embroidery a Golden Fleece, being his badge of honour as a Knight of the Order of St James.¹ In other three days they recrossed the mountains, and brought to their comrades the news of their success; but brilliant as had been their triumph, it was short-lived. At this time several ships had been descried off the coast, and the Council sent out two sloops and the longboat of the Rising Sun to reconnoitre and ascertain what vessels they were. They proved to be Spanish warships, who, on sighting them, immediately gave chase; but the sloops being good sailers, and having a favouring breeze, got safely back to the harbour. The longboat fell astern, and was forced to run ashore into Carret Bay, where it was ultimately lost. On the 23rd February, a few days after Campbell's victorious return, eight Spanish warships, and on the 25th three more, came to anchor within Golden Island, over against the mouth of the harbour, so as to blockade it. All hands, seamen and landsmen, were now put to work to repair and strengthen the batteries of the fort, as far as they were able. The Spanish ships, which were under the command of Don Juan Pimienta, Governor of Carthagena, did not venture into the harbour, but men were landed from them to the eastward of the settlement, out of reach of the guns of the fort. These were shortly afterwards reinforced by other troops that came overland from Panama and Sancta Maria, accompanied by numbers of Indians, Negroes, and Mulattoes.

In this connection the following entry appears in the books of the Company: "19th October 1703. Paid for cutting a Medal presented to Captain Alexander Campbell of Finab, for his service done the Company in Caledonia against the Spaniard, £25."

Pimienta, who also came on shore, gradually drew his men towards the neck of land leading to the Peninsula of New Edinburgh, on which Fort St Andrew had been built. To add to the calamities of the besieged at this time, by the accidental explosion of some gunpowder a fire broke out among their huts, burning several rows of them to the ground. This involved great loss of personal effects to many of the men, while numbers of the sick people had to be hastily rescued from the huts to save them from the flames.

On 17th March, after frequent skirmishes—several being killed and wounded on both sides—the colonists were compelled to retire upon their fort, thus leaving the neck of land free and open for the Spaniards to pass over.

On 18th March, so desperate was the position of the colonists, that at a meeting of the Council, land and sea officers, held in the fort, it was unanimously resolved to empower Captain Veitch, accompanied by Mr Main, the interpreter, and a drummer, to proceed to the Spanish camp to treat with the general about articles of capitulation. But the Spanish terms were so hard—being nothing less than a complete surrender of all the Colony's ships, ammunition, and goods—that the treaty broke up without effect. On the 24th the Spaniards were within a mile of the fort, and creeping still nearer, they mounted a battery against it at a spot where the fort was weakest. At the same time they maintained direct communication with their fleet by boats from the shore. The enemy now got so near the fort as to cut off the water-supply, a rivulet half a mile distant, necessitating the colonists to use the water within the fort, which was a brackish puddle and most pernicious to health. The provisions also were now not only scarce, but bad and unwholesome,—“the bread was mouldy and corrupt with worms, and the flesh most unsavoury and ill-scented.” Even the surgeons’ drugs were about exhausted, and the fort was like a hospital of sick and dying men. Mr Borland says:—

“At this time when we were so hemmed in by the Spaniards both by sea and land, we were also plagued with a sore, contagious, raging and wasting sickness, which was now become epidemical; and those of us who were not affixed to our beds, were become exceedingly weak and feeble, so that at this juncture they could hardly make out 300 able men fit for service. This did exceedingly dispirit and discourage our men, the surviving daily beholding what numbers were swept away by violent and sudden deaths. Sometimes we would bury 16 men in a day; and men walking up and down in tolerable case to-day, would sometimes be surprised with the stroke of death to-morrow, hence there was a general consternation of spirit among us.”

On the 28th and 29th March the Spaniards took possession of a wood within musket-shot, and fired on the fort on both of those days from under cover of the trees.

On the 30th of March, to the surprise of the colonists, the Spanish general made an overture to treat with them, and on the 31st the leading colonists came to an agreement with him to deliver up the fort on being allowed to embark on their ships "with colours flying and drums beating, together with their arms and ammunition, and with all their goods." The garrison were loud in their demands for a capitulation, and all the councillors and officers agreed to it except Captain Campbell of Finab, who strongly dissented, being against any treating with the Spaniards otherwise than by the sword.¹ The articles were signed on behalf of the Spaniards by Don Pimienta, and on behalf of the Colony by the two remaining councillors, Captain Gibson and Captain Veitch—Byres having left the Colony for Jamaica on 7th February, and Major Lindsay having died a few days prior to the capitulation. The three ministers in the Colony were specially solicitous that the Spaniards should not ill-treat the friendly

Indians after the withdrawal of the colonists, and provision for this was attempted to be made in article vii. of the capitulation, which read: "That the Indians who have been friendly to us and conversed with us, since we came hither, shall not be molested on that account." But the Spanish general refused to accede to this. He stated that the Indians were the subjects of the King of Spain, and he knew best how to treat his subjects, but if the Indians kept out of his way he would not search after them. Mr Shields presented a petition and made a personal appeal on their behalf, which much provoked Don Pimienta, who sharply said, "Cura tua negotia" (Attend to your own business); to which Shields replied, "Curabo" (I will attend to it).

On the evening of Thursday, the 11th of April 1700, the surviving colonists weighed anchor and abandoned their unhappy settlement after a stay of four months and eleven days. Theirs had been a frowning Providence, and they gladly left the scene of their sorrows, little anticipating that even a worse fate, if that were possible, awaited very many of them.

The ships had some difficulty in getting out of the harbour, the Rising Sun especially. There was little wind, and the men — both landsmen and seamen — were feeble in health; but by towing and warping, with the help of the Spaniards, the ships were got safely to Golden Island, where they anchored next day in view of the Spanish fleet.

The voyage to Jamaica was but a repetition of all the horrors of the "middle passage" which a few months previously had attended the ships of the first expedition. Mr Borland states that the men were crowded together, particularly those on board the Rising Sun, "like so many hogs in a sty or sheep in a fold, so that their breath and noisome smell infected and poisoned one another," and that their food consisted of "a little spoiled oatmeal and water." Sometimes there were buried at sea, from on board the Rising Sun, eight or nine in a morning. Similar mortality took place on board the other ships.

were mostly dispersed in Jamaica and the other English settlements in America, and very few returned to Scotland.¹

Of the four ships forming the second fleet, none returned to Scotland. The Rising Sun, Captain James Gibson, was dashed to pieces in a hurricane off the harbour bar at Charleston, Carolina, and all on board—112 souls—perished. The same hurricane destroyed the Duke of Hamilton, but those on board were saved. The Hope was cast away on the rocks of Colorados, Cuba, also without loss of life. The fourth ship, the Hope of Bo'ness, while on the way to Jamaica, became so leaky that Captain Dalling had to run her into Carthagena, the nearest port, where he sold her to the Spaniards for a nominal sum.

Thus terminated the unfortunate attempt to colonise Darien, costing Scotland nearly 2000 lives and over £200,000 sterling in hard cash without any tangible return.

On his return to Scotland after the first abandonment of the Colony, Paterson could look back with a clear conscience on the singleness of aim and purity of motive which governed his conduct in connection with the ill-fated Darien scheme. Its failure implied no slur on his character. In a letter, dated Edinburgh, 6th February 1700, addressed to his tried friend Captain Thomas Drummond, at Darien, he says :—

“In all my troubles it is no small satisfaction to have lived to give the Company and the world unquestionable proof that I have not had any sinister nor selfish designs in promoting this work, and that unfeigned integrity has been at the bottom of this. How and what I have suffered in the prosecution thereof, God only knows; and God Almighty lay it no further to their charge who have been the cause. I have always prayed for this; but must needs confess, could never, since my unkind usage, find the freedom of spirit I do now; and I must needs say that my concern of spirit is such, that I could not only join with those who have done me prejudices, although it had been willingly, but even with the greatest enemies I am capable of having, to save my country and secure the Company.”

When he penned these lines, Paterson still indulged the hope of returning to the Colony, but this intention was frustrated by the second abandonment in April 1700.

Notwithstanding the final collapse of the scheme, Paterson did not give up his advocacy of the great commercial advantages which he believed would accrue from the establishment of a settlement in the Isthmus of Darien. He accordingly planned his scheme anew, but on broader lines, in which England was to have a preponderating interest. This amended scheme, which he personally submitted to King William, was received with much favour by his Majesty ; but that Prince's unexpected death in 1702 put a stop to further proceedings in the affair.

CHAPTER VIII.

RESTITUTION OF THE CAPITAL, WITH INTEREST, TO THE SUBSCRIBERS OF THE DARIEN COMPANY.

IN the month of September 1699, shortly after Councillor Daniel Mackay had arrived in Edinburgh by special express from Darien with accounts of the good condition of the Colony, strange rumours came to hand by advices from Sir William Beeston, Governor of Jamaica, to Secretary Vernon, London, that the colonists had absolutely deserted the settlement and gone and dispersed themselves, nobody could tell where. The story was at first set down as altogether malicious and false, and was even laughed at by Mr Mackay, who, at the time, was on the eve of returning to the Colony. But on 10th October the Directors themselves confirmed the unhappy rumours. They wrote: "The report which we had on 19th September of the Colony's desertion proves too true, for we have advices from New York that the big ships, the Caledonia and the Unicorn, are arrived there in the beginning of August." In another letter, of same date, addressed to The Original Council of the Colony at New York, the Directors say: "The surprising and unaccountable news of your shameful and dishonourable abandonment of Caledonia on 29th June last, without any the least hint thereof from yourselves, affords us but too much matter of reflection on your infatuated proceedings for some time past."

It happened that, at the time when the rumours reached Edinburgh, the Company's second expedition, consisting of the Rising Sun and her three consorts, was lying in the Clyde, fully equipped, waiting a favourable wind to proceed to Darien. But as already mentioned, the councillors on board that fleet, although requested by the Directors to delay their departure pending the receipt of fresh sailing orders, hurriedly set sail before the fact of the abandonment of the settlement could be communicated to them. Shortly after their departure, Councillor Mackay, who it had been intended should have accompanied them, followed in the Speedy Return,¹ and Captain

¹ Councillor Mackay met with a tragic end on his return journey. In the passage betwixt Jamaica and Darien, while standing on the poop fishing for sharks, the ship gave a lurch, and he was thrown into the water; and although a boat was lowered and search made, he was never seen again.

Campbell of Finab also followed in another small vessel. These gentlemen were sent express by the Directors, by different routes, and both carried important dispatches to the new Colony. Later on, another ship, the Margaret of Dundee, Captain Leonard Robertson, commander, sailed from that port with a cargo of provisions and strong liquors; but it did not reach Darien until the middle of June, two months after the colonists had surrendered the settlement to the Spaniards, whose ensigns were now seen flying on the fort.

The interest of the Scottish people was now centred on the fate of the 1300 colonists who had embarked in the second expedition. In due time dispatches came home advising their arrival at Darien, but containing also the expression of their bitter disappointment at finding the settlement deserted, and the fort and huts in ruins. After voting on the question, the new colonists resolved to land and replant the settlement. Unfortunately, the majority of the councillors were lukewarm in the business, and after a short experience despatched most depressing reports to the Directors, which further deepened the gloom prevailing among their fellow-countrymen at home.

The Darien enterprise had taken possession of the Scottish heart, and if any one so much as presumed to doubt its usefulness or success, he was deemed a public enemy. On 25th November 1699 the Earl of Marchmont, writing to the Rev. William Carstares, King William's confidential Secretary in London, says—

"The concern" (regarding Darien) "which appears in persons of all ranks, and even the meaner people who are not particularly interested and have no shares in the stock, for supporting and prosecuting the undertaking, is a thing scarcely to be imagined. I will assure you that any that would pretend here to persuade anybody that the falling out of that design may prove a prejudice to this nation would prevail nothing, but lose himself and carry the ill-will and disesteem of almost every one."

The people generally were now in a strange temper in regard to the affair. On 20th June 1700 the universal depression was temporarily relieved by intelligence arriving of the victory of Captain Campbell over the Spaniards. The patriots of Edinburgh, now calling themselves "Caledonians," assembled in "Pate Steill's Parliament," in the Cross Keys tavern, and decreed that the city should be illuminated in celebration of the event. This business was carried out with all the stern and resolute daring usual to an Edinburgh mob. The populace gathered in crowds from all quarters, and ruthlessly smashed all the windows that were not illuminated, without respect to rank, except that, if anything, they did more damage to the houses of members of the Government. The mob next attacked the Tolbooth, the "Scottish Bastille," and with sledge-hammers and fire destroyed the door, setting the prisoners at liberty. The magistrates were paralysed. When these worthies appeared on the scene, accompanied by the veteran Town Guard, they were brushed aside "by a great many in gentlemen's habits, who came briskly up to them with drawn swords." The mob also seized and locked the Netherbow Port, in case the Lord High Commissioner's troop of Guards from Holyrood House should be brought upon them; they also requisitioned the services of the musical bells of St Giles, although these were under town authority, causing them to be jangled merrily to the tune of "Wilful Willie, wilt thou be wilful still?" At the end of the fray it was estimated that glass to the value of £5000 (Scots money?) had been destroyed.

The tumultuous joy of the so-called patriots was soon extinguished. In little more than a week after the display of the illuminations, news came to hand of the surrender of the colonists to the Spaniards, and the consequent ruin and final abandonment of the settlement. Popular indignation now burst forth in all directions. "Nothing," says Sir Walter Scott, "could be heard throughout Scotland but the language of grief and of resentment. Indemnification, redress, revenge, were demanded by every mouth, and each hand seemed ready to vouch for the justice of the claim. For many years no such universal feeling had occupied the Scottish nation."

Not only had Scotland sustained great loss of life and treasure, but the national pride had been wounded by the entire defeat of the country's efforts to establish a foreign trade. The ferment of the people was intensified by the knowledge that the failure of their enterprise was, as they believed, largely due to the unfriendliness of their sovereign and the jealousy and hostility of the English people. They felt that the honour and independence of Scotland required to be vindicated.

Paterson was in Edinburgh when the painful news of the final evacuation of the Darien Settlement came to hand, and he at once frankly acquiesced in the failure. His attitude at this time was beyond praise. Instead of sinking under the accumulated disasters, he rose superior to his reverses. He used his influence in the most disinterested manner to allay the extreme irritation prevailing among his countrymen, and left out of account all his own personal sufferings and losses. He tried to persuade the incensed subscribers to the stock of the Company to bear patiently what they could not remedy; and he represented to them that the opposition of the English Government was only one of the contributing causes of the failure, and that the want of foresight in the Directors at home, and the dissensions and lack of energy in the Council on the spot, were main factors in the misfortunes that had taken place. These averments as to gross mismanagement both at home and in the Colony were supported by the testimony of Captain Campbell of Finab, who returned to Scotland from Darien about this time. In August 1700 the Duke of Queensberry, then Lord High Commissioner in Scotland, stated that Paterson had succeeded in moderating the anger of the Scots respecting Darien, and in disposing them "to concert such things as they should agree upon, and were proper to demand in Parliament." His Grace added: "Mr Paterson is against moving anything this session about Caledonia (Darien), and tells me that he thinks he has gained some considerable men to his opinion. He has no by-end, and loves this Government in the Church and State."

At the same time, Paterson had the conviction that justice would yet be done by England to the unfortunate subscribers to the Company. To this end, in his various plans for reviving the Darien Settlement he invariably included a clause making provision for indemnifying the subscribers for their losses. This indemnification is particularly dwelt upon, as not only an act of justice but of good policy, in his great tract, 'Proposals and Reasons for Constituting a Council of Trade,' which was originally printed at Edinburgh in 1700-1, when the extreme discontentment at the failure of the Darien enterprise had somewhat abated.

When the Estates of Parliament assembled in May 1700, several addresses and petitions from the shires and burghs, as well as from the Company itself, were presented in support of the Company's title to Darien, and a resolution was proposed that the Colony was a legal and rightful settlement, and that Parliament would uphold it as such. And when news of the final evacuation of the settlement reached Scotland at the end of June, the Estates took up the matter in earnest, declaring that Darien was a national affair, and should be considered before anything else, except religion. For years, from this time onward, Darien became a prominent question, and occupied a large space in the discussions of the House.

When the Parliament reassembled in October, the king endeavoured to soothe the members by sending a conciliatory message through the Duke of Queensberry, his Commissioner. He expressed his regret that, for "invincible reasons," he was unable to agree to assert the Company's right to settle a colony in Darien, but he was heartily sorry for what had happened, and was most willing to concur with Parliament in any measures for aiding and supporting the Company, and for repairing their losses.

But the members were not satisfied with the royal message, and expressed keen resentment at the harsh treatment which they, as well as the Company, had received at the hands of both Spain and England. So strong was the feeling in the House on the burning question of Darien that, on the 16th of November, the business of the day was interrupted in order that two pamphlets assailing the Company, and a third lampooning Paterson's personal character, might be considered. After some parts of the pamphlets had been read, they were found "to be blasphemous, scandalous, and calumnious," and the same were ordered "to be brunt by the hand of the common hangman of the city of Edinburgh at the Mercat-cross thereof." Two of the tracts were alleged to have been written by Walter Herries, who had been surgeon and purser on board the first expedition, and who now appeared as a renegade Scot and libeller of his nation. A few weeks afterwards a proclamation was published offering £6000 Scots as a reward for his apprehension.

Towards the end of the session, in January 1701, the subject of Darien was again brought forward, and was debated with much heat and clamour. The interference of the king and the English Parliament with the Company's Act in December 1695 was censured, and strong disapproval of the Hamburg Memorial of April 1697 and the Colonial proclamations was expressed. The debate was closed by the House ratifying the Company's original Act, and continuing all their privileges for the space of nine years beyond the period originally allowed.

During the remainder of King William's reign the people of Scotland showed their sullen resentment in many ways, and it has been stated that, if they had been possessed of a capable leader, nothing could have prevented a rebellion against the king, and war with England. This feeling of violent discontent was carried into Queen Anne's reign. On this point Sir John Dalrymple, in his 'Memoirs,' says :—

"In Scotland alone the Queen was embarrassed in her Government. . . . The passions of the high and low against England and English Councils, on account of the sufferings of the Darien Company, fluctuated from rage to sullenness and from sullenness to rage."

An incorporating Union had been one of King William's favourite projects. Soon after his accession to the throne, he had recommended it to the Scottish Parliament as the only effectual means of preventing dissensions between the two countries. And on 28th February 1702, eight days before his death, his Majesty sent a message to the House of Commons again recommending a Union, which, from his approaching dissolution, he had no hopes of accomplishing himself. One of the first acts of Queen Anne also was to send a letter to the Scots Parliament, in June 1702, in which she reiterated the late king's appeal for a Union, and earnestly recommended its favourable consideration. The Queen's Commissioner also dwelt strongly on the advantages which would flow from such a Union.

During this session the matter made considerable progress, when the Scots Parliament empowered the queen to nominate Commissioners to treat for a Union. The Commissioners appointed from each kingdom met at the Cockpit, Westminster, 10th November 1702, and at their sittings came to an agreement on several points, but some difficulties arose which led to the adjournment of the conference. One of these was in connection with the Darien Company. The Scots proposed that the privileges of the Company should be preserved intact; but this was objected to by the other side as being incompatible with those of the English East India Company, and that the existence of two rival companies might prove injurious to the trade of the United Kingdom. On 1st February following, the Scots again brought forward their proposal, this time in writing, for consideration at next meeting, with the additional proviso that, in the event of the dissolution of the Darien Company being insisted on, the subscribers should be recouped at the expense of the public treasury. But at the next meeting, held on 3rd February, a letter was read from the queen adjourning the Commission; and it never met again. Although the joint deliberations at this time did not result in any definite agreement, they paved the way for the final arrangements for the Treaty, and the Scots Commissioners had the satisfaction of having left on record their views as to the manner in which the Darien Company should be dealt with in future negotiations with England. The minutes of the Scottish Parliament, of 9th September following, contain a resolution that the Scottish Commission for the Treaty is "terminat and extinct," and not to be revived without the consent of the Estates.

The chief aim of the Scots in any negotiations for a treaty of Union was to secure admission to the advantages of English trade everywhere. They determined to use all fair means to get this accomplished, and to show England that she could not wrong them with impunity. In accordance with this resolution, in the Parliament which assembled on the 6th of May 1703 the Scots passed the famous Act of Security, by which it was enacted that, on the death of Queen Anne without issue, her successor in Scotland should not be the same as the individual adopted by the English Parliament, unless the Scottish people were admitted to share with England the full benefits of trade and navigation. The Act also provided that the affairs of Scotland should, for the future, be thoroughly secured from English or foreign influence. By a further clause, which was to come into force at once, all the fencible men in Scotland of the Protestant faith were to be trained in the use of arms by being drilled once a month at least. The Act was triumphantly carried in an excited House; but the Queen's Commissioner refused to give the measure the royal assent, as it openly proclaimed a determination to dissolve the regal Union. This was met again by the Estates refusing to grant supplies until the Act should receive the queen's sanction.

During the same session the powers and privileges of the Darien Company were again ratified.

The Scots Parliament reassembled on 6th July 1704, when the Act of Security was again passed, and duly reported to the queen. On the advice, mainly, of her sagacious counsellor, Lord Godolphin, although not without hesitation, the queen now gave way. The Act was confirmed by the royal assent on the 5th of August, and a supply for six months was voted by the House unanimously.

The passing of the Scotch Act of Security caused much alarm in England. Orders were issued from London to call out the Militia of the four northern counties, and to fortify and garrison several of the English border towns, so as to be prepared for an invasion from the Scots.

At this critical juncture an unfortunate incident occurred which further inflamed the mutual resentment between the two nations.

The Darien Company, after the miscarriage of their great colonisation scheme, and consequent loss of their capital, made a feeble attempt to carry on a colonial shipping trade. One of their vessels, the Annandale, equipped for a voyage to India, put into the Downs in order to complete her crew. While there she was boarded and confiscated at the instance of the English East India Company, and restitution was solicited by the Darien Company in vain. Shortly thereafter, by a singular coincidence, the Worcester, Captain Thomas Green, commander, an English East India ship (erroneously supposed to belong to the English Company) put into the Firth of Forth for repairs. At the place where she was moored the ship was visible from Edinburgh, and a popular cry got up that the Government officials should seize her by way of reprisal; but they declined to interfere. The Darien Company, founding on the wide powers contained in their Act, thereupon issued a warrant for the seizure, and their zealous secretary, Mr Roderick Mackenzie, resolved to execute the warrant himself. For this purpose Mackenzie enlisted the help of eleven "genteel pretty fellows," whom he met at the Cross in the High Street. These he divided into two bodies, and they visited the Worcester, ostensibly as pleasure parties unacquainted with each other. Mutual hospitality was indulged in on board, when at a preconcerted signal from Mackenzie his mercenaries overpowered the crew, about double their number, and captured the ship. The vessel was detained at Burntisland, and while there some of Green's men, either in their anger or their cups, let slip words importing that Captain Green had been guilty of piracy on a ship belonging to the Darien Company, and had murdered the crew. Two of Green's men, both negroes, were specially free in their talk on the subject, but the name of the vessel that had been attacked was not stated. It happened that the Company, three years previously, had despatched a vessel to India, the Speedy Return, commanded by Captain Thomas Drummond, and it had not been heard of since. It was, therefore, concluded that the people of the Worcester had captured her and murdered the crew, and that Providence had directed them to the neighbourhood of Edinburgh for punishment.

These rumours reaching the Privy Council, they took up the matter, and after a searching examination, Green and his crew were arrested and brought to trial before the Court of Admiralty. Although there was no direct evidence to prove that the vessel in question was the Speedy Return; Green and several of his men were brought in guilty of piracy, robbery, and murder, and were sentenced to be hanged on the sands of Leith. The Government were disposed to obtain a reprieve from the Crown for the prisoners, whose guilt was so very doubtful. The queen also interposed, and the carrying out of the sentence was postponed; but the mob of Edinburgh, with their usual fury, intimidated the authorities, and demanded the lives of the prisoners. The affair resulted in Captain Green, Madder, his first mate, and Simpson, a gunner, being executed on the 11th of April 1705, in terms of the sentence. They all died protesting their innocence. The rest of the crew were dismissed after being imprisoned for a time. Unfortunately, it subsequently transpired that Captain Drummond, whom the Worcester's people had been charged with murdering, was actually alive in a distant land at the time of the execution, so that if Green and his men had ever committed piracy on any vessel, it could not have been the Speedy Return. The impression went abroad that the unfortunate men had had scant justice, and had been sacrificed in retaliation for the ill-treatment of the Darien Company by the English Government.

This unhappy affair excited the keenest resentment in England, and still further embittered the strained relations of the two countries. The friends of peace and progress were now deeply impressed with the conviction that a legislative Union should no longer be delayed. This step alone, it was believed, would compose the differences and extinguish the heats that were subsisting between the two nations.

The Estates reassembled on the 28th June 1705, but the royal message was not read till the 3rd of July. In her letter Queen Anne urgently advised the Estates to follow the example set by England and provide for the appointment of a Commission to treat for a legislative Union. On the 24th of August, after debates on the state of the currency, and trade, and respecting the succession, the draft of an Act empowering Commissioners to meet and treat with English Commissioners for a Union was presented to the House by the Earl of Mar, and read. The proposal led to a long and warm discussion, which culminated in the question of the selection of the Commissioners. On 1st September the Duke of Hamilton, who had up to this time retarded the passing of the Act, now suddenly made a change of front, and astonished his party by moving that the Scottish Commissioners should be nominated by the queen. This clause was carried by the small majority of eight, and with it the whole Act, which was passed amidst a scene of great excitement.

The Scottish Commissioners were selected and appointed by the queen on 27th February 1706, and those for England on 10th April,—thirty-one on either side. Like their predecessors of November 1702, they assembled at the old Council Chambers of the Cockpit, Westminster, and their first sederunt was held on 16th April 1706. Happily, on this occasion they met in a conciliatory spirit, all being impressed with the gravity of the crisis, which was simply a choice either of "one Parliament or two Crowns."

On the 21st of June the Scots Commissioners proposed that the rights and privileges of the Darien Company be continued after the Union, or if the privileges of the Company were judged inconvenient for the trade of the United Kingdom, that the private rights of the Company be purchased from the proprietors. On the 25th the Commissioners for England answered that they were of opinion that the continuance of the Darien Company was inconsistent with the good trade of the United Kingdom, and consequently against the interest of Great Britain, and therefore they insisted that it ought to be determined. But

'being sensible that the misfortunes of the Company had been the occasion of misunderstandings and unkindnesses between the two Kingdoms; and thinking it to be above all things desirable, that upon the Union of the Kingdoms, the subjects of both may be entirely united in affection, they therefore wish that regard may be had to the expenses and losses of the particular members of the Company, in the manner hereafter mentioned; and they hope that when the Lord Commissioners for Scotland have considered how generally that undertaking was entered upon in Scotland, and consequently how universal that loss was, they will readily agree to the proposal."

Following upon this, the English Commissioners, "being extremely desirous to bring the Treaty to a speedy conclusion," agreed that, on the completion of the Union, the sum of £398,085, 10s. should be paid to Scotland as "an equivalent" for what that kingdom should become liable for towards payment of the debts of England, and for agreeing to an equality of taxes. They further proposed that the equivalent money should be applied (1) in discharging the public debts of Scotland, (2) in renovating the coin, and (3) in repaying the capital stock of the Darien Company, with interest at 5 per cent; and that immediately on such repayment of the capital stock and interest, the Company should be dissolved and cease. All these proposals, in connection with the equivalent, were embodied in No. XV. of the draft Articles of Union, which were signed by the Commissioners on 22nd July, the day before their meetings terminated.

When the proposed Articles of the Union were remitted to Scotland, and brought up for discussion in Parliament in the month of October, they roused great indignation all over the country. Day after day addresses from the shires, burghs, and parishes respectively poured in upon the Estates, all couched in nearly identical terms, and protesting against an incorporating Union with England. In the month of November riots took place at Glasgow, and an armed force publicly burned the Articles at Dumfries. At the same time a stream of pamphlets, chiefly assailing the Union, issued from the press. Paterson took part in the fray, but he appeared on the other side of the controversy—that of promoting the Union; and in his ‘Proceedings of the Wednesday’s Club in Friday Street’ he gives an able exposition of the necessity for and advantages of an incorporating Union, and combats the various adverse opinions prevalent on the subject. This was not a new idea with him. For several years he had advocated such a measure, and before King William’s death he had entered zealously into his Majesty’s policy of a legislative Union. In Paterson’s opinion, the very failure of the Scottish aims at colonial enterprise in Darien made a closer union with England all the more imperative. He was in Edinburgh in September and October 1706 on the business of the Union, having been appointed by Lord Treasurer Godolphin to a Commission, along with Drs Gregory and Bower, to examine the public accounts. While so employed he penned five important letters, with a statement of the debt and revenues of both nations, demonstrating the reasonableness and advantages of the Union. These letters appear in a manuscript in the British Museum. His friend, James Dupré, writing to him some time afterwards on the subject of his letters, addresses him "To William Paterson, Esq., my most honoured and worthy master," and says, in reference to the influence the letters had on the Union question, that "they bore such weight with the Committees appointed to examine the several matters referred to them, that we may without flattery say that they were the compass the Committees steered by." The following extract from his fourth letter, dated Edinburgh, 8th October 1706, written three days after the opening of Parliament, describes clearly how the non-success of the Darien scheme was one of the accelerating causes of the Union. He says:—

"Although the keeping up of our [Darien] Company could not possibly prove of any benefit to its proprietors, but, contrariwise, be a certain hazard and loss, besides the needless umbrage it would give, yet will it, in the fruits of the Union, have had better success for the time than any other in Christendom—viz., a return of its capital stock advanced, with 5 per cent interest, besides the honour of being the means of uniting this noble and famous island, and thereby being the means of introducing, not only its own members, but with them their whole country, into a free and open trade. I doubt not but you will remember that when we first proposed this Company, the prospect of its being instrumental in bringing a Union was warm and sensible on our spirits, as being the best and most desirable issue it could possibly have. Even the success we wished for, and sought in our attempts to Caledonia, could not possibly have terminated in more than this. And of this, our early sentiments and inclination, the motto of our Company is, and will be, a standing monument—viz., Vis Unita Fortior.

“In fine, as it is plain this Company hath rather been calculated and fitted for and towards bringing a Union, than for subsisting in an ununited state; and since, if the Union had been brought about by good success in our attempt to Caledonia, we have reason to believe no good patriot would have been angry, it would certainly be strange to find any so, when even the miscarriage of that design hath contributed to the Union.”

Towards the end of December 1706, when the fifteenth Article of the Treaty (dissolving the Darien Company and making provision for its losses) came up for consideration before the Estates, it caused much stir. The Court of Directors of the Company expressed dissatisfaction with the terms proposed, liberal as these were, on the ground that the compensation offered involved the dissolution of their Company. They prayed to be heard by counsel as to the value of the privileges conferred on the Company by their Act, which were now to be sacrificed. On this point De Foe says that the proposal of the Directors was put forward not so much in behalf of the Company as to put a stop to the Union, since it was evident that two India companies, one English and the other Scottish, could not be consistent with the good trade of the United Kingdom. The Company's proposal was therefore rejected, and the fifteenth Article, after some alteration and amendment, was approved and carried.

The Estates thereafter referred it to a special committee to look into and consider what the capital stock of the Darien Company, with interest, might amount to, together with the Company's debts, and to report the same to Parliament. Accordingly, when the committee brought in their report, dated 21st February 1707, it was found that the total amount due to the Company, as at 1st May 1707, in respect of capital stock, debts, and interest, amounted to £243,166, 0s. 3d. sterling, made up as follows:—

DARIEN COMPANY.—Total capital stock advanced by the proprietors, with interest at 5 per cent to 1st May 1707 . . .	£229,482	15 1½
Add —Debts due by the Company	14,809	18 11

Deduct —Money lent to proprietors	1,126	13 9½
<hr/>
Balance due to the proprietors .	£243,166	0 3

When the committee's report was submitted to Parliament on 5th March, it transpired that a considerable amount of interest previously allowed by the Company to certain proprietors had been overlooked. The report was therefore referred again to the committee, in order that the calculation of the interest might be revised. By making allowance for this omission it was found that the balance due to the proprietors would have to be modified by the sum of £10,281, 15s. 2½d., thereby reducing the grand total of the compensation from £243,166, 0s. 3d. to £232,884, 5s. 0¾d. sterling, the amount afterwards inserted in the relative Act.

The committee further found that there were debts due to the Company amounting to £22,951, 3s. 3¾d., consisting entirely of call-money in arrear by the proprietors, with interest to 1st May. This indebtedness the committee recommended should be cancelled, and the debtors discharged, on the ground that if payment were to be insisted on, it would merely temporarily increase the capital stock of the Company, and the money would fall to be paid back to the debtors again. The last amount that the committee condescended upon was a sum of £1654, 11s. 0¾d., the value of the Company's "dead stock." These assets consisted of "the ship Caledonia, lying in the river of Clyde, with her furniture, guns, and apparelling; that lodging at the back of Milns Square, over against the Tron Kirk, with some little household plenishing therein;¹ and the Company's share of the cargo of the Speedwell, shipwrecked in the East Indies, effeiring to the Stock of six hundred pounds Sterling, with the burden of Cellar rent of the stores of the Caledonia, and the expenses of keeping the said ship after the first of May; and of the freight, seamen, and factor's wages of the said cargo of the Speedwell, and other supervenient charges upon the said ship and cargo."

The committee recommended that the above "dead stock" money should be retained by the Company for the purpose of defraying the costs attending the liquidation—such as Directors' fees, staff salaries, and legal expenses; and also for awards to be granted to gentlemen-officers and others who went to Darien, for their faithful services.

The 25th of March 1707, the day on which the Scottish Parliament sat for the last time, was a red-letter day in the life of Paterson, for on it he beheld the royal sceptre extended to touch the Act concerning the Payment of the Sums out of the Equivalent to the African

Company. By this Act an amount "not exceeding the sum of £232,884, 5s. 0½d. sterling," was directed to be paid to the Darien subscribers in restitution of all their losses—a great boon to the Scotland of that period; and this consummation was largely achieved through the unremitting pleadings of Paterson during the preceding six years.

On the same memorable day, a signal mark of honour was given to him in connection with the part he took in bringing about the Union. The Minutes of Parliament record that "It being moved to recommend Mr William Paterson to her Majesty for his good service, after some reasoning thereon, it was put to the vote, Recommend him to her Majesty or Not? and it was carried Recommend."

Mr Hill Burton ('Darien Papers') states that it was only in a comparatively small number of cases that the subscriber who signed the subscription book in 1696 signed the receipt for the Equivalent certificate in 1707. In many cases the certificates were taken by assignees, in others by successors, and in not a few by arresting creditors. De Foe partly explains this by stating that the miscarriage of the Darien Company's designs had been so effectual that not only was their paid-up capital all expended, but they were much in debt besides.

This made the subscribers so apprehensive of further calls that many of them eagerly sold out their stock, several offering to dispose of their whole interest for 10 per cent on the original holding. And although repayment of the capital stock to the subscribers was provided for in the Treaty of Union, yet the fury of the opposition to the Union was so pronounced, both inside and outside of Parliament, that holders of Darien stock had little dependence on the Treaty being carried out.

Reimbursement to the Darien subscribers was to be made in cash. The queen appointed twenty-five Commissioners to administer the funds, and the Equivalent money lay in the Bank of England.

De Foe, who was in Scotland at the time, gives an account in his 'History of the Union' of the manner in which the Equivalent money was paid in Edinburgh. In terms of the Articles of Union, the money should have been paid on 1st May 1707; but July arrived, and there was no advice of its having left London. Scandalous reflections began to spread abroad to the effect that the English, having secured the Union, would pay only when they pleased, and perhaps never. Others gave forth the idea that, the money not being paid on 1st May, the Union was dissolved; "and there was a discourse of some gentlemen, who came to the Cross of Edinburgh, and protested in name of the whole Scots nation that the conditions of the Treaty not being complied with and the terms performed, the whole was void." At last, in August, the money arrived in Edinburgh, in twelve waggons guarded by a party of Scots Dragoons, who drove directly to the Castle, where the gold was deposited. Even this did not satisfy the populace. They hooted the drivers, and railed on the very horses that drew the waggons ; and when the drivers returned from the Castle, they were stoned. Of the total amount of the Equivalent, £100,000 only was brought to Edinburgh in gold, the remainder being in Exchequer bills, payable on demand, which the Bank thought would be readily taken in Scotland. This raised a new clamour, the people declaring that the English had tricked them by putting them off with bills payable 400 miles away, and which, if lost or mislaid, or by accident burnt, were irrecoverable. The Commissioners saw the mistake, and sent to London for £50,000 more gold. They also intimated that nobody would be obliged to take bills without their consent. In a short time, as the people found that Exchequer bills were accepted in payment for large transactions, and that they could readily be exchanged for coin or bills of exchange payable in London, their dislike to them gradually wore off. De Foe further remarks that, from an "interest" point of view, the Bank had hoped that the Exchequer bills would remain in circulation in Scotland; but in this they were disappointed, as the bills returned to England so directly that in six months' time there was not one to be seen north of the Tweed.

CHAPTER IX.

WILLIAM PATERSON'S INDEMNITY AND HIS LAST WILL.

WHEN the lost capital of the Darien Company was repaid to the proprietors out of the Equivalent Fund, there was, unfortunately, none of the money for Paterson, as he was not a stockholder; and by an oversight in stating the Equivalent, his claims and demands on the Company for services and personal losses were, in his absence, left out and omitted. Thus, by a strange irony of fate, while he had been instrumental in having the losses of others made good, his own claims had been overlooked.

True, one of the very last resolutions of the Scottish Parliament was to recommend him to Queen Anne for his services in connection with the Union arrangements, but no personal benefit accrued to him from the recommendation.

In the "preamble" to the London subscription book of the Company, dated 6th November 1695, there was an obligation by the English subscribers to pay to Paterson a commission of 2 per cent (£12,000) on the total subscription money of £600,000, and 3 per cent of the annual profits for twenty-one years or an additional £12,000.

These payments were to be made in consideration that "William Paterson, and others concerned with him, have been at pains and expense in making several discoveries of trade and improvements in and to both Indies, and likewise in procuring needful powers and privileges for a Company of commerce from several foreign Princes and States, which he and they have contrived, suited, and designed for this Company."

But on 29th November, after the London list was closed, at a meeting of the English Directors in the city, at which three of the Scotch Directors were present, Paterson of his own accord took the opportunity of intimating that he freely and fully resigned all his claim, although it was quite a legal one, to the commission promised in the preamble of subscription, and would, in lieu thereof, trust to the honesty of the Directors for his remuneration. In making this generous renunciation, he explained that the 2 per cent and the

3 per cent were meant as returns for the expense of "near £10,000 which he and others had been at, besides his ten years' pains and travel, six whereof were wholly spent in promoting the design of the Company." The minute goes on to say, "It was agreed, nemine contradicente, that Mr Paterson have the thanks of this Court for his generous declaration and surrender."

As already mentioned, owing to the hostility of the English Government the London subscribers eventually cancelled their subscriptions and withdrew from the Company. This action on their part consequently left Paterson without any hope of compensation from that quarter.

In the following spring (1696) Paterson visited Scotland for the purpose of assisting the Scottish Directors in the flotation of the Company there, and by the 1st of August the whole capital of £400,000 was subscribed.

On the 6th of October, after having had several business meetings with Paterson in Edinburgh, the Court of Directors voted him the sum of £7500, as an honorarium for the great expense he had been at for several years in making valuable discoveries of trade, &c., and for showing his affection for his native country and the Company by relinquishing

England and his profitable business there, to his own damage and loss. They further promised him a share of the profits of the Company, "proportionate to the success thereof." But, alas! these resolutions, which required the approval of the Council-General of the Company, were never confirmed, and Paterson never received payment from the Company of any of the money thus voted to him.

The disasters at Darien left him bankrupt both in purse and in health. In August 1700, in a letter to the Rev. William Carstares, the Duke of Queensberry says: "Paterson knows nothing yet of my having obtained anything for him; and I am a little embarrassed how to give him what I am allowed for him, lest his party in that Company should conceive any unjust jealousy of him, or he himself think that I intend as a bribe that which is really an act of charity."

In the first Parliament of Great Britain (March 1708) the House of Commons passed a resolution in Paterson's favour in regard to his Darien claims, and proposed "that such a recompense be given to him as might be suitable to his services, expenses, losses, and public cares." But notwithstanding the announcement, he did not obtain a

On 4th April 1709, when Paterson was in great straits, he addressed a memorial to Queen Anne, which he forwarded through Lord Treasurer Godolphin, accompanying it with the following letter:—

“MY LORD,—The dependence I have had upon the public for a settlement in its service, or for some way or other to have a recompense for what I have done for near seven years of Her Majesty's reign, besides former losses, hath at last so reduced me and my family, that without a speedy provision and support from Her Majesty, I must unavoidably perish.

“It was the daily hope of some suitable provision from the Government which first enabled me to support myself, by borrowing at an expense triple to what might have sufficed in a retired life without public business or prospects.

“The expectation of my claim on the Equivalent has kept me up for the last two years; but since that is still postponed, and as it now stands, I can have no relief till next Session of Parliament, and then instead of ready money I can expect only debentures on the growing Equivalent; I am thereby reduced to extreme distress.

“The enclosed Petition to Her Majesty contains the sum of my case, which necessity obliges me now to represent; and I most humbly entreat your Lordship, of whose goodness I have had such particular instances, to intercede with Her Majesty now, at last, to take some immediate care of me, and so establish me for the future that I may be preserved, and be made further useful during the rest of my life. Humbly hoping for your Lordship's speedy and effectual care of me in this distress.—I am, Your most faithful obedient Servant,

“WILLIAM PATERSON.”

The memorial to the queen, which accompanied this letter, narrated that it was he (Paterson) who first proposed and formed the scheme for relieving the public credit by establishing the Bank of England in 1694, for which he had no recompense; that the large share he had afterwards in the proceedings, misfortunes, and losses of the Darien Company, as well as his concern in the true interest of Great Britain, induced him to propose a complete Union, by which these losses might be repaired and future misunderstandings removed; that, in 1705, he formed a scheme for the Union which was favourably entertained, and he spared nothing to forward it, whereupon the Parliament of Scotland recommended him to the queen; and that his long troubles rendered him unable to extricate himself from difficulties without her Majesty's special care and protection. So he prayed the royal countenance to his claims, and in the meantime for his services he asked a provision for himself and his family so as to subsist, and that he might devote the remainder of his life to the State.

In response to this painful appeal, Paterson appears to have been allowed some small gratuities. His name stands in the Queen's Bounty Lists of 1712 and 1713 for two or three sums of £50 to £100. During all this reign, year after year, he pressed his claims for an indemnity upon Parliament, succeeding in the Commons, but as often defeated in the House of Lords through the opposition of "a violent party." Tradition affirms that at this time he supported himself by teaching mathematics and navigation.

At length, in 1713, a numerous committee of the House of Commons reported in favour of his claims, awarding him the substantial sum of £18,241, 10s. 10 $\frac{2}{3}$ d., and a Bill was passed in the House in his favour, which, however, was thrown out by the Lords.

But in 1715, in the first year of the reign of George I., another Bill, intituled "An Act for relieving William Paterson, Esquire, out of the Equivalent Money for what is due to him," was passed into law without opposition, and the long-deferred indemnity was duly paid to him, and his hard trials came to an end.

The indemnity was made up as follows :—

Amount due to Mr Paterson, as voted by the Directors of the Darien Company on 6th October 1696 .	£7,500	0	0
Interest on that sum from 6th October 1696 to 25th March 1713 . . .	6,175	15	0
Expenses incurred by Mr Paterson from 6th October 1696 to 1st May 1707, the date of the dissolu- tion of the Company by the Union	5,250	0	0
	£18,925	15	0
Less —Sums already paid to Mr Pater- son, with interest	684	4	1½
Leaving amount of indemnity payable to Mr Paterson	£18,241	10	10½

It is somewhat strange that even in the present day there appears to be doubt as to the ultimate treatment of Paterson by the Government; and, indeed, in some quarters the belief is still entertained that he never received payment of the indemnity awarded to him. In this connection there is included in the Appendix (D.) a detailed and interesting official letter on the subject, addressed to 'The Scotsman' a few years ago, by the late Mr James Simpson Fleming, F.R.S.E., Cashier (General Manager) of the Royal Bank of Scotland, the banking corporation which was the lineal successor to the "Equivalent Company." The letter is conclusive, and removes all dubiety on the point.

One of the immediate effects of the pecuniary relief now afforded to Paterson was to stimulate him to further labours on behalf of the State. In 1715 he circulated the draft of his plan for the redemption of the National Debt among the members of both Houses of Parliament. This, his last important financial treatise, he published in 1717, two years before his death, as a continuation and conclusion to his previous work, 'The Wednesday's Club Dialogues' of 1706.

As already mentioned, he had to support himself for some years by borrowing money at excessive rates of interest on the strength of his claims on the Equivalent; but now he was happily enabled to discharge his obligations. Not only so, but he was placed in a position to gratify his benevolent inclinations. Mr Bannister states that, while his name occurs in the books of the Royal Scottish Corporation in Crane Court for small sums during the years of his distress, he appears in them, after he had received his Darien indemnity, as one of the most liberal givers to that charity.

Paterson made his will on the 1st of July 1718, in which he had the satisfaction of bequeathing a sum of about £7000 to his relatives, and a special legacy of £1000 to his old friend and executor, Mr Paul Daranda, merchant, London. As the

Parliamentary grant of 1715 was £18,000, this points to the sum of £10,000 as having been absorbed in payment of his debts. Mr Bannister states that Paterson died in January 1719, and that in an obituary notice in the 'Register' of 1718-19 he is referred to as "the great calculator."

COPY OF THE WILL OF WILLIAM PATERSON.

"I, WILLIAM PATERSON, of the city of Westminster, Esquire, being in good health of body and mind, for which I most humbly thank and praise Almighty God, the ever blessed Maker and Preserver of all, do make this my last will and testament. On the 3rd July 1718, the testator certified the making of his will "at the Ship Tavern, without Temple Bar, about four in the afternoon." The will was proved in Doctors' Commons on 22nd January 1719 o.s.

Paterson's career is dramatic enough to form a story of thrilling interest.

In estimating his life-work, it is unfair to give the Darien failure, which was no fault of his, too prominent a place, to the exclusion of his many other eminent labours.

As we have seen, he originated the Bank of England, and gave substantial help to the Government Commissioners in Scotland when they were carrying on the Union negotiations. He had a profound knowledge of finance, and for years, and until his death, was a trusted counsellor of the Ministers of his day. He stood out as a vigorous opponent of inconvertible paper currency, when that financial delusion was popular under the lead of the notorious John Law; and this opposition prevented its adoption so far as Scotland was concerned. His scheme for the redemption of the National Debt, which formed the basis of "Walpole's Sinking Fund" of 1717, was pronounced by 'The Economist' of 23rd October 1858 to be "faultless."

On many other questions he was far ahead of his time, and quite abreast of public opinion of our own day. He was one of the first to propose the formation of public libraries; and, in 1703, he offered his own valuable collection of books and pamphlets on economic subjects, in English,

French, German, and Dutch, to form the nucleus of a public library for the study of trade and finance.¹

He advocated free trade when others called for protection and monopolies. In his day intolerance in religion was the rule, but he was a lover of religious liberty in its widest sense, and this formed part of the constitution of the Darien Colony. Writing to Lord Provost Chiesly on 9th July 1695, some months before the Company was floated, he says: "Above all, it is needful for us to make no distinction of parties in this great and noble undertaking; but that of whatever nation or religion a man be, he ought to be looked upon, if one of us, to be of the same interest and inclination."

He also held enlightened views on outstanding social questions: he advocated universal education, the useful employment of offenders, and freedom from imprisonment for honest debtors.

In all his labours for the general weal, his aims were entirely unselfish and pure. He wrote anonymously, deeming his reward to be sufficient if his writings proved useful to his fellow-men. There is thus singular fitness in the motto, Sic vos non vobis, "Thus you (toil) not for yourselves," inscribed under the only portrait of him that we possess.

He was a deeply religious man, and knew his Bible "by heart," making apt quotations from it in most of his publications. When the deaths occurred of Mr Thomas James and Mr Adam Scot, the two Presbyterian ministers who accompanied the first expedition to Darien, he personally took the earliest opportunity to have their places filled. Writing from Darien on 18th February 1699 to a friend at Boston, New England, he says: "We have been exceeding unhappy in losing two ministers, who came with us from Scotland, and if New England could supply us in that, it would be a great and lasting obligation." Further, it would appear in his inception of the Darien scheme that, along with trade, he had conceived the idea of propagating the Gospel among the pagan natives in the "regions beyond." In the letter to Lord Provost Chiesly just quoted, he concludes with these words: "So hoping that Almighty God, who at this time seems to have fitted so many able instruments both of our nation and others, and given us such an opportunity as others have not, will perfect the begun work, and make some use of Scotland also to visit those dark places of the earth whose transactions are full of cruelty."

But perhaps the crowning feature of Paterson's character was the lofty spirit which animated his whole conduct. In his long years of distress, and when his services were requited with obloquy and his motives misconstrued, he could not be induced, even in controversy, to show any vindictive feeling or give an angry retort, and thus his noble heart never disgraced itself.

He was held in high esteem by those who knew him best. Notwithstanding that the people of his native Dumfriesshire lost heavily by the Darien scheme, and were bitterly opposed to the Union, he was returned to the first united Parliament in 1707 along with William Johnston. But, upon petition, the House decided that it was a double election, and he was unseated. It may also be mentioned to his honour that, in 1710, Moll dedicated his folio map of the West Indies to him, other maps of the same series being inscribed to Prince George of Denmark, the Duke of Marlborough, Lord Somers, and other great men.

In the light of this record of the life-work of a Scotsman who flourished two centuries ago, is it too much to express the hope that Paterson's memory will be kept fresh and green "as long as rivers run, and gold is found in Darien"?

And We do hereby not only grant and concede, and declare a general and equal freedom of government and trade to those of all nations who shall hereafter be of, or concerned with us; but also a full and free liberty of Conscience in matter of Religion, so as the same be not understood to allow, connive at, or indulge the blaspheming of God's holy Name, or any of His Divine Attributes; or the unhallowing or profaning the Sabbath Day.

And finally, as the best and surest means to render our Government successful, durable, and happy, it shall help of Almighty God) be ever our constant and chiefest care, that all our further Constitutions, Laws, and Ordinances, be consonant and agreeable to the Holy Scripture, right Reason, and the Examples of the wisest and justest nations, that from the Truth and Righteousness thereof we may reasonably hope for and expect the blessings of Prosperity and Increase.

APPENDIX D.

LETTER, MR JAMES SIMPSON FLEMING, F.R.S.E., TO
 'THE SCOTSMAN.'

WILLIAM PATERSON AND THE DARIEN SCHEME.

EDINBURGH, 5th August 1880.

SIR,—In your interesting notice of the Calendars of State Papers in 'The Scotsman' of 31st July, you refer to William Paterson, the founder of the Bank of England, and to the recognition of his claims in connection with the ill-fated Darien scheme by the private Act of the first Parliament of George I., in 1714, which awarded him the sum of £18,241, 10s. 10½d.; and you add, "but what, if anything, followed on this has hitherto evaded inquiry."

I was led some years ago partially to investigate this point, which has been raised repeatedly; and your article having renewed the interest in Paterson's history, I have now looked further into the papers to which I have access, and if you will allow me space I think I can set the matter at rest.

The claims of William Paterson were long subject of discussion, and so early as 6th October 1696 the Directors of the African Company awarded him £7500, and further resolved "to take into consideration what suitable gratifications they will appoint out of the subsequent profits of their trade, and proportionate the same to the success thereof." Without receiving payment of the sum awarded, Paterson went to Holland and Hamburg on the Company's service.

The Treaty of Union followed, by which provision was made for the repayment of the capital stock of the African Company with interest, and the dissolution of that Company. By an Act of the Scottish Parliament passed 25th March 1707, the Directors were appointed to state the account of the debts and stock of the Company, so as in the whole not to exceed the gross sum of £232,884, 5s. 0 $\frac{2}{3}$ d., and this having been done in Paterson's absence, his claim was "left out and omitted." He then appealed to the first Parliament of Great Britain, and by an Act passed on 1st April 1708 it was declared that the omission of the Directors to state his claims should in no way prejudice them, and that they should be certified and satisfied as the sums should be proved before the Judges of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, who were required to "make a full and fair representation thereof to His Majesty." In 1710 the Judges made a report of a somewhat indefinite character, and in 1713 Paterson again petitioned Parliament, and claimed £32,592, 15s. 10 $\frac{2}{3}$ d. The committee to whom the petition was referred resolved "that the petitioner hath been at great expense and pains, and sustained very considerable losses, in the service of the late African and Indian Company of Scotland, and ought to be reimbursed and have a recompence for the same"; and "that the sum of £18,241, 10s. 10 $\frac{2}{3}$ d. ought to be answered and made good to the petitioner." Thereupon followed the private Act, to which you refer, of 1st Geo. I. (1714), "for relieving William Paterson, Esq., out of the Equivalent money for what is due to him." The Commissioners of the Equivalent were thereby required to issue and pay to Paterson, his executors, administrators, or assigns, the said sum in debentures, for sums of not more than £500 nor less than £100 each, "for the more easy and convenient assignment and transferment thereof."

William Paterson was in pecuniary embarrassment pending the adjustment of his claims. Arrestments were used in the hands of the Commissioners of the Equivalent in 1707 and 1708, at the instance of Alexander Deans, son of the deceased Robert Deans, merchant in Edinburgh; and in 1716, at the instance of Mrs Elizabeth Carstairs, relict and executrix of Mr William Carstairs, Principal of the College of Edinburgh, and one of the ministers of the city. On 7th July 1710, Paterson, described as of the parish of Saint Margaret's, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, executed a deed of assignment of all his claims against the Commissioners of the Equivalent to James Campbell, of London, merchant, to secure £2000 money lent, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. The arrestments were discharged in 1717, and Campbell's debt was satisfied, as will be seen immediately.

The Act having passed, Paterson, on 25th October 1715, granted a power of attorney to William Bowles, of the city of Edinburgh, His Majesty's Solicitor to the Court of Exchequer in North Britain, to receive the debentures directed to be issued from the Commissioners of the Equivalent in 181 debentures for £100 each, and in a debenture for £141, 10s. 10½d., and to grant a discharge therefor. Some delay arose at this stage in consequence of the assignment to James Campbell, already noticed; but on 23rd February 1715-16, Paterson, by letter to the Commissioners, desired them forthwith to issue £3000 of the debentures to Campbell or his order, in such sums as he shall direct, "for which debentures the said James Campbell is to be accountable to me." By an endorsement on this letter James Campbell requests the Commissioners to issue the debentures in his own name, and to "deliver the same to the Honble. John Campbell, Esq., Lord Provost of Edinburgh, for my account." Of the same date (23rd February 1715-16) James Campbell, by letter to the Commissioners, desires them, notwithstanding the intimation of the assignment by Paterson in his favour already noticed, to issue to Paterson or his attorney a part or sum not exceeding £12,000 of the debentures, "until matters are settled between us, which are now in an amicable way of accommodation."

The "differences" between Paterson and Campbell were shortly thereafter "composed by arbitrators"; and by letters dated 12th June 1716, Paterson directs the Commissioners to deliver to Campbell Equivalent debentures for £1741, 10s. 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ d., in addition to £3000 formerly issued to him; and Campbell directs that after this additional issue to him the Commissioners will "follow the directions of the said William Paterson, Esq., with respect to such part or surplus of his debentures as may still remain unissued."

Following on these various directions, the Commissioners of the Equivalent issued, on 13th March 1716, 120 debentures in name of William Paterson for £100 each—in all, £12,000; and 6 debentures in name of James Campbell for £500 each—in all, £3000. On 1st November 1716, the Commissioners issued 16 debentures for £100 each—£1600; and 1 for £141, 10s. 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. in name of James Campbell—together, £4741, 10s. 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ d.; and finally, they issued 15 debentures for £100 each in name of William Paterson—£1500,—making in all the sum awarded to Paterson by the Act in his favour of £18,241, 10s. 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ d.

The transaction was closed by a formal discharge by William Bowles, as attorney for William Paterson, dated 23rd December 1717, by which he acknowledges to have received from the Commissioners "debenture notes issued furth in the name of the above William Paterson for the sum of £1500 money, which, with the sum of £12,000 formerly issued furth in the name of the said William Paterson, and the sum of £4741, 10s. 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. issued furth in debentures in the name of Mr James Campbell, of London, merchant, conform to and by the directions of the said William Paterson, compleats and is in full of the sum of £18,241, 10s. 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ d.," specified and contained in the Act, of which the Commissioners are discharged.

The debentures so issued, of which, as we have seen, £13,500 were in name of Paterson, were declared to be transferable by endorsement. When, to whom, and for what consideration Paterson's debentures were transferred does not appear; but they were readily negotiable in London, and must have been disposed of shortly after they were issued, for Paterson died in 1718. In that year an Act was passed (5th George I., cap. 20) providing for the incorporation of the proprietors of the Equivalent debt, including the sum payable under Mr Paterson's Act, and making a total capital stock of £248,550, 0s. 9½d. Letters patent were issued incorporating "The Equivalent Company" on 21st November 1725. Books were directed to be opened at London and Edinburgh for the purpose of recording the Equivalent debenture subscribed into the new company, and the whole of the debentures issued under Paterson's Act were subscribed at London by various parties resident in London, who thereby became proprietors of stock of the Equivalent Company. This corporation existed till 1850, when its capital stock of £248,550, 0s. 9½d. was paid up by the Government, and the company was dissolved by Act of Parliament.

I would only add that the original documents from which I have quoted are now before me, and they will, I think, be regarded as conclusive of the settlement, tardy as it was, of Mr Paterson's claims.—I am, &c., J. S. FLEMING.

CALEDONIA: or, The
SCOTS COLONY IN DARIEN
In the West Indies.

With an Account of the Manners of the Inhabitants and Riches of the Countrey.

BY A GENTLEMAN LATELY ARRIV'D.

LONDON:

PRINTED AND SOLD BY JOHN NUTT, NEAR STATIONERS-HALL. MDCXCIX.

[In the 'Darien Papers,' Dr Hill Burton states that this curious and scarce work, purporting to have been written by a gentleman lately arrived from the Scots Settlement in Caledonia, affords a detailed and distinct account of the adventure, as far as it had been conducted up to that time. The work, however, bears internal marks of being a made-up book, compiled partly from the Council's dispatches from the Colony to the Directors in Scotland; while the descriptions of the Darien Indians and of the nature of the country are borrowed largely (in some places word for word) from Lionel Wafer's 'New Voyage to America,' which was published earlier in the same year (1699).]

The History of Caledonia, &c.

CHAPTER I

Of the Erecting of the Company of SCOTLAND Trading to AFRICA and the INDIES.

THE SCOTS having observed the great Benefits arising to all Nations by Trade, which was not well understood, and put into Method, till about the latter end of the last Century, in this part of the World, and that, above all others, that of Africa and the Indies was the most Beneficial, have long ago projected to share in it with their Neighbours. But by the Policy of those who had already felt the Sweets of it, and who feared a Diminution of their Gain, they found, till of late Years, unsurmountable Difficulties.

But in the year 1688, they having, for the most part, Early appeared in the Revolution, and served his Present Majesty with great Zeal, they thought they might Justly Promise to themselves a suitable Return to so great Merits, And having managed their Business with great Dexterity, they found themselves not frustrated of their Expectation.

About Three years ago, under the Administration of the Earl of Twidale, who was mightily influenced in this Affair by Secretary Johnson, Son of the late Laird Warreston, an Act was touched by the Scepter for erecting a Company to be called the Company of Scotland Trading to Africa and the Indies, with great Immunities,—vizt. of being Custom-free for above Twenty Years; and that all Ships which should be taken or damaged by any other Nation, to be made Good at His Majesties charge. These Two Provisos in the Act, were a mighty Encouragement; For by the first they were enabl'd to undersel their Neighbours, and by the second they were always sure of His Majesties Protection, being obliged by the strongest Ties of Interest.

CHAPTER II.

Of the Opposition against it.

No sooner was the News of this Act of Parliament spread abroad, but it was opposed in England by all concerned in the East India Trade, who made a mighty noise against it. Some indeed contemned it, and making severe Reflections upon the poverty of Scotland, look'd upon it as a Chymetical Project; but the wiser sort here thought it might be of dangerous Consequence; making serious Reflections upon the great Priviledges granted the New Company, thought many, both here, in Holland and other Nations, might easily be induced to joyn with them; and accordingly, many began, even here, to talk of Subscriptions, and remitting great Sums of Money; and more particularly the Hamburgers, had a Project of Subscribing an Hundred Thousand Pound. But the Parliament sitting here about the time when the Discourse of this Great Affair was at the hottest, the Companies most concerned, made their application to them, and prevailed so much, that they quite dashed all Subscriptions here; and that they might, if possibly, quite Ruin the Scottish Project, they addressed His Majesty, That he would take all care, and use all possible Methods to suppress it; they obtained a Promise, That some Methods should be taken, and His Majesty making some Reflections upon what had passed, was pleased to express himself, He had not been well served in Scotland. But the Act being passed, and the whole Kingdom being engaged in it, it was looked upon as next to an impossibility, to have it Repealed. All that could be done, was to quite discourage all from Subscribing here, and to remonstrate to the Hamburgers the Injury their Joyning with the Scots would be to the English Trade. Accordingly, Sir Paul Rycart, His Majesty's Minister to that Republick, had orders to press it home: Upon which the Hamburgers put out a Declaration in Justification of themselves, and seemed resolv'd to pursue their Project. But upon Cooler Thoughts, &c., considering the mighty benefit they received from the English Trade, they having made it their Staple for Cloth, for the North Parts of Europe, to the mighty enriching of that Republick; and that it was not impossible, that they might remove the said Staple from thence to some other place, as formerly they had done from Antwerp, to the mighty prejudice of that City; and being warmly pressed by his Majesty's Minister, they at last resolved to desist, preferring certain Riches before uncertain Gain.

CHAPTER III.

Of the Progress of the Company.

THE Scots seeing that no Subscriptions from England were to be expected, the Frowns of the Parliament having quite discouraged all here; and that the Hamburgers were for preferring a present and certain Gain to their former Expectations, being resolved to Keep all means open, they resolved to stand upon their own bottom, and to shew to the World that they were not so Chymical as some gave out, they set themselves more warmly to carry the Project on, and accordingly subscribed £400,000, most of the Nobility and Gentry, and all the Cities and Royal Boroughs, unanimously concurring, giving the World a sufficient Proof that Scotland was neither so Poor, nor so Disjointed, as some people would have it believed. This great foundation being laid, the Superstructure went on apace: First, they bought them a Noble House in Miln-Square in Edenborough, to serve both for the Offices of the Company and a Warehouse. Then they began to build and buy Ships, both for Burthen and War, the chief of which are the St Andrew, the Unicorn, the Caledonia, the Dolphin, and the Endeavour. And here it's not improper to remark, that before this late Revolution they had no Men of War in Scotland, but now being partly necessitated by the Long War, and to carry on the designs of the Company, they have a pretty good Squadron, some of 60 Guns apiece and upwards.

After they had procured Ships sufficient for the present Designs of the Company, there was a great Debate among the Company, to what part of the Indies the Ships should be sent: and this part of the World was amused with various Rumours of the Scots designs. But the first Project laid by Mr Pater-son, about Ten Years ago, for settling a Colony in the Isthmus of Darien prevailed. Accordingly Three Stout Ships and Two Tenders were Equipped in the Port of Leith in the Frith, and all manner of Provision and Warlike Stores put on Board, with about 1200 Seamen and Soldiers, the Complement of the last being the most select Foot of Scotland; they sayl'd from the Frith with a prosperous Gale, and went round by the Orcades, and having a prosperous voyage, about the middle of November, the last year, 1698, arrived safe in the Bay of Darien, having lost few or none of their men.

As soon as they were arrived safe in the Bay, after their hearty Thanks to Almighty God for their safe arrival, they fell to sounding the Coasts, and found within a great Chain of Islands (among which is the Golden Island, by the Spaniards called St Katherine) a most large and capacious Port, where Ships of the greatest burthen may safely ride secure from wind and weather.

The Entrance of the Port, to which they have given the Name of the Port of New St Andrew, is not above Cannon-shot over; so that it's very capable of being defended against the Attacks of any Enemies, they having already raised Platforms for that End. Upon the Low Neck of a Promontary within the Bay, which contains not above Thirty Acres of Land, they have begun to build them such Houses as so short a time can give them leave; which they have covered over with the Leaves of the Tree called Plantain, whose leaves are about a Foot and a half long: For the better Security of the New Fort, they have cut the Isthmus or Neck of Land on which it stands, for about 130 paces and let in the Sea. So that it has no Communication with the Land but by a Bridge; in this Fort they have already Mounted 50 Guns, and placed in it a Garrison of near 600 Men.

As soon as they had fortified themselves against all suddain surprises, they sent Deputies to treat with the Indians, of which you shall have a particular account after the General Description in the following Chapter.

CHAPTER IV.

A short Description of the Country of DARIEN; Now called CALEDONIA.

THE Country of Darien, is one of the most Famous Isthmuses in the World. It's about a hundred and twenty Miles long, and three score broad. If it were possible to cut a Channel from Sea to Sea, capable of Shipping, it would facilitate the Navigation of the World two parts in three; but it's next to an impossibility, for it's almost a continued Chain of Mountains, of which some are as high as any of the Alps, especially those towards the North Part, which is only described in these Papers, none of the Colony being able to give so exact an Account of the South as yet.

The Valleys are watered with Rivers and Perpetual clear Springs, which are most pleasant to drink, being as soft as Milk and very Nourishing.

The Rivers that fall into the North Sea, because of their short course, are not Navigable; for they have their rise from the high Chain of Hills above, which reaches all along the Isthmus, within twenty Miles, and sometimes less to the Sea. From the top of the Hills, is one of the most pleasant Prospects imaginable; for you have there a clear view of the North Sea, and the Various making of the Shore, together with the Adjacent Islands, which are called Samballas, between which, and the Continent runs a Channel about a League over, which makes all along the Coast numberless safe Harbours, and supplies the defects of the Rivers which are small, and commonly (because of the Violent Land Floods in the rainy Season, that carries down infinite Earth and Mud) are barred with flat Oozy Sholes.

These Hills are Clothed with tall Trees without any under-wood, so that one may gallop conveniently among them, many Miles free from Sun and Rain, unless of a great continuance. The Air makes on the tops of the Trees a pleasant Melancholy Musick, so that one of the Colony considering the Coolness, Pleasant Murmuring of the Air, and the infinite beauty of a continued Natural Arbor, called them the Shades of Love.

Between these Hills and the Sea, are gentle declivities and a rich fat soyl full of all manner of Vegetables, among which are many not known to us in Europe. It's capable of any improvement, but towards the shore in many places, especially near the Mouths of Rivers are Morasses, in which grows a Tree which rises from several Roots, to which was given the Name of the Stilt Tree, because the Roots like Stilts are entangled one among another. It's a Tree of about a foot Diameter. It has red bark and may be good for dyeing and dressing of Leather. This Tree is very troublesome to Travellers, because it makes a continued thicket.

The whole Country is comprehended between the eight and tenth degree of Northern Latitude, and has its name from the River called Darien; whereby its Northern Coast is bounded to the East. It's more subject to Rain than any other Country in the same Latitude, because of its Mountainous Scituation between the Atlantick or Northern Ocean, and the Pacifick or mare del Zur. The Rains begin in May, and last four or five months, but are very gentle at first like April showers, but after are more Violent, insomuch, that sometimes they make a kind of a deluge, covering the ground in some places seven or eight Foot all on a suddain, and carrying down Trees with great Impetuosity, but those that are acquainted with the Country know how to avoid the danger. But those Rains, even in the wettest Months, are not so continued, but there are many fair Days, and sometimes a week together with small Thunder-showers, and refreshing breezes of Air. The pleasant dry months are December, January, February, March, and April. The Sky is then very serene, and not so much as a cloud to be seen, and notwithstanding the warm scituation of the Climate, it's extreamly Pleasant, everything having a fresh verdure and odour, the Air gently fanning the Inhabitants, so that the heat is so far from being troublesome that it's delectable.

But the Country tho' it be Rich and Fruitful on the surface, is yet far Richer in its Bowels, there being great Mines of Gold; for the Deputies were certainly informed that not above 12 Leagues from New Edenborough, was a great Mine of this precious Metal, on which were employed near 1,000 Blacks, and that in the River Scanta Mena, which is not above Thirteen Leagues from this Colony, and which falls into the South Sea, the Spaniards every year get Gold dust to the value of a Million.

And here it may not be unpleasant to the Reader, to give him an Account of the manner of getting the Gold dust, which is as follows : They have little Wooden Dishes which they dip into the Water and take it up half-full of sand, and at every dipping they find some Gold mixed with the sand ; they shake the sand and the Gold goes to the bottom, and the sand rises and goes over the brim of the Dish with the Water ; then with a Loadstone they extract the Iron dust from it, and so it's clear of any other ore or filth. This can only be done in the fair Season, for the Rivers are too deep in the wet, and then is the Gold brought down by the impetuous deluge from the Mountains. It's easy to guess from this what vast Mines may in time be discovered, when Art and Industry are joyned together, and of what importance it will be to Great Britain to take all possible measures to preserve this Colony.

CHAPTER V.

Of the Reception of the Deputies of the Council by the DARIENS, and of their Manners and Customs.

THE Reader in the third Chapter, had mention of a League made between the Dariens and the Company. It will not be improper here, to give an Account of the reception of the Deputies and the manners of the Indians.

After the Colony had refreshed themselves ashore, and taken all possible precautions against any suddain surprise, by such fortifications as could be made in so short a time ; It was agreed on by all, that it would add much to the Security of the enterprise, if they could enter into a League and strict bond of friendship with the Indians, whom they knew to be great Enemies of the Spaniards, who had endeavoured to extirpate them, but could never prevail, by reason of the invisible paths of the Country. Accordingly some Deputies were sent out, among whom was Mr Paterson, the chief Projector of the whole design. They found the Indians were, as it's before related, very tractable, and had certain intelligence that one of their great Kings (as they call their Chief Captains in their Language) was not far off upon the great ridge of the Mountains, and would be very glad to understand their design, and enter into any League against the Spaniards whom they mortally hated. They set out with a small train to give no occasion of Jealousie, and had several slight merchandises, as Beads, Linnen and Woolen Cloaths and other things, which they knew would be acceptable Presents to the wild Indians.

They found the Country, thro' which they pass'd, of an exceeding Rich soyl, but much covered with Wood, as above related, only here and there they met with some places which the Indians called in their Language Savannahs, where they plant their Mari, a kind of Corn something like wheat, upon little hillocks, at a little distance one from another. These Savannahs are not level, but consist of small Hills and Valleys, with pleasant spots of Wood intermixt, which serve both for pleasure and profit, of which more hereafter.

The Indians were so secure, that they saw several of them sleeping in Hammocks tied to two Trees, and had no other Covering or Canopy, but large Plantain Leaves, for they were told by their Priests, or rather Magicians (who went a Conjuring, which they call Panawing, as soon as our Fleet arrived), that the People newly arrived would be a great assistance against the Spaniards their Enemies, and would never molest them in any matters of Religion, but live in good Correspondence with them, if they failed not on their Part.

The Panawing is performed, as the Deputies were informed, with hideous yellings and shrieks, in which they imitate sometimes the hissing of Serpents; sometimes the croaking of Toads; sometimes the yelping of Foxes and barking of Dogs; to which they joyn the noise of several stones struck together, and of a sort of Drums made of Bamboes. They labour so hard and strain themselves so much, that they are all in a great sweat, and often fall into strange extasies and trances for a considerable time, and then renew their shrieks again, till the Oracle be given. The great Enemy of Mankind and Lover of Discord invited by such jarring Music, at last visibly appears, and audibly gives his Answer, which for the most part proves exactly true that he may the better delude these poor Creatures, who stand in great awe of him.

But to return where we left off, after they had made two easy days Journey, they arrived at the place where the King was, which was on the top of a very high Hill, which had a Noble Prospect towards the North Sea, as far as the Eye could reach, and was Crowned with a most Noble Grove of Stately Trees; some of which were eleven Foot Diameter, which bears a Cod about the bigness of a Nutmeg, full of short Wool, which when ripe is blown about by the wind, and is of small use, tho' it's something like Cotton.

As soon as the King had intelligence that the Deputies were near at hand, he sent a few Persons of the best Quality to Conduct them to his presence; these were attended with a sort of Musicians who play'd upon a kind of Pipes made of small hollow Bamboes and Reeds full of notches, with which they made a kind of whining noise, but nothing Musical to European Ears, and all the Company, to keep Consort, made a humming at the same time to themselves.

As they approached nearer, they were diverted with a Dance of 40 Men in a Ring, who stretched out their hands and laid them on one another's shoulders, moving gently sideways round in a Circle, wrigling themselves into a thousand ridiculous postures, something like the Highland Dances in Scotland. After they had Danced a pretty while, one of the Company jumped out of the Ring and Play'd several Antick Tricks, throwing and catching a Lance, bending back towards the ground and springing forward again with great Activity, to the no small admiration of the Deputies.

Most of them were six foot high, strait and clean limb'd, big-bon'd and full breasted ; their faces were round, with short bottle noses ; Eyes large and sparkling, white even Teeth.

Their hair was strait, long and black, which they wore down to the middle of their back or lower ; hanging loose at its full length. They often scratched their heads, and when they found any lice, they would immediately put them in their Mouth and eat them ; it's supposed they have not the use of Combs.

They had no beards, neither does any of the Nation wear any, but has it, as well as the hair in other parts, pulled up by the Roots' by their Women, except the Eye-Brows and Eye-Lids ; for which purpose, because they have not the use of small Pincers, they most dextrously make use of two sticks, between which they pinch the hair and pluck it up.

Their Colour, as is the rest of the Nation, was Orange Tawney ; (for this description may serve for the whole Nation, and, therefore, the digression is the longer). They had newly anointed themselves with Oyl, which they make use of, to make their Bodies shine and to make the Skin smooth and supple, and hinder it from Parching ; they had drawn upon their Skins many Figures of Birds, Fishes, and Trees, in many parts of their Bodies, but especially of their Faces ; the Colours were red, yellow and blue. They are laid on with Pencils made of jagged and beaten sticks.

They were quite Naked, and had not so much as a Rag about them, only a piece of Plantain Leaf, which was rolled up into the Figure of an extinguisher, and but half covered their privities.

They had all a piece of an Oval thin Plate of Gold, which covered their Mouth from corner to corner, and hung dangling over their Lips, being fixed to the inner part of the Nose.

They had several Chains of Teeth, Shells, Beads, hanging from the Neck down upon the Breast and to the Pit of the Stomach ; which was looked upon by them as the greatest piece of finery, and the more weighty and more numerous the Chains are, the more they value themselves upon their Dress.

But to put an end to this long, yet necessary Digression : When they were come to the top of the Hill, and almost in sight of the King, to shew how welcome they were to both Sexes, they were entertained by a Dance of Women, who behaved themselves with great modesty and activity, dancing in a Ring, as the Men did.

They had every one of them a piece of Cotton Cloath about their middle, tied behind with a Thread, hanging down to their Ankles ; they were very plump and fat, well-shaped, and had lively brisk eyes, but something short, and a little too thick.

Their features were very regular, their Hair long and black, which was tied together with a string just behind the Head.

These women danced still before the Deputies, till they were arrived in the King's presence, whom they found seated under a Tree of an extraordinary bigness, upon a kind of a Throne made of several Logs of Wood, piled neatly one upon another, and covered with a sort of Party-coloured Cloth, which he had purchased of the Spaniards for a great Sum of Gold. He had on his Head a Diadem of Gold Plate, about ten inches broad, indented at the top, lined within with Network, made of small Canes, and a Robe shaped something like a Frock, of Cotton, down to his heels, with a Fringe of the same Cotton above a Span long, with short wide open sleeves, reaching only to the middle of his Arms ; his face was painted with Red, as if he designed War upon some of his Neighbours ; he had a Plate of Gold hanging over his Mouth, of an Oval Figure, covering his mouth from corner to corner ; he had hanging at each Ear a Pendant made of two large Plates of Gold, fastened to a Ring, the one hanging before to the Breast, and the other behind on the Shoulder: the Plates were about eight inches long, and shaped like a beast.

Those who attended him wore on their Heads a kind of Diadem made of Cane-work, indented and jagged at the top, wrought very fine, and well painted, set round at the top with long beautiful Feathers, in the form of a Crown.

They all wore several Chains of Teeth, hanging down from the Neck above a Foot. The Teeth were all indented and over-run, tallied and notched exactly with the other, which made them look like a solid piece of Bone.

The Deputies, after they had made a Low Obeysance to his Majesty, were conducted by the Master of Ceremonies, who is always a Principal Man, to some Seats made of Logs of Wood, covered with Cotton Cloth, just over against the King's Throne, but much lower. After they were seated, they were by the same Master of Ceremonies commanded to give an account of the Affairs they had to transact with his Majesty. Then Mr Paterson, the First of the Embassy, rose up, and after due reverence, made a short and pithy Speech; the substance of which was, That they were come from the uttermost Coast of the World, being the Subjects of a Mighty Prince, to admire his Grandeur, to establish Traffick, and to make a strict League with him against all Enemies whatsoever.

There was a most profound silence during the Speech, and it was observed that his Majesty smiled, and often twirled the Plate of Gold which covered his mouth, which was a sign that he was extremely pleased. But I cannot here omit one thing which happened just when the Speech was ended, which was no small cause of Laughter. A Drove of Monkeys came leaping up and down the Branches of the Trees, and making extraordinary squeaking, sometimes breaking the little Branches, and throwing them down among the people, and pissed among them, and hung down by one another's Tails in a Chain; and swinging in that manner till the lowermost catch'd hold of a Bough of another tree, and drew up the rest ; and it's by this means that they pass from top to top of high trees, whose Branches are a little too far asunder for their leaping. The Indians looked upon this as a very good Omen, and interpreted it thus, That as the Monkeys by this Stratagem were a mutual assistance one to another, so the Scots and Indians would be, and that all would end in pleasure and profit.

After this little Diversion was over, all was hushed again in a profound silence. Then, by his Majesties Order, a Noble Indian stood up, and made a Speech, the substance of which was, That the bearded Men were welcome ; that there should be nothing wanting that they could possibly assist them in ; that a League should continue while Gold and Floods were in Darien (an Expression used there to signify Perpetuity), and that they might be assured of it the more, his Majesty would Swear it by his Teeth, and Touching of Lips with his Fingers.

After this Speech was ended, the Deputies were ordered to withdraw, which they did, making a Profound Reverence to his Majesty. Then they were conducted to a pleasant cool place, at a little distance from the place of Audience ; where they were entertained with a sort of Drink made of Indian Mace, which was very strong, but of a Sourish Taste, and is very windy.

The Deputies asked if they had any other sort of Drink ? Upon which presently was brought in great Calabashes a milder Drink, called Mislaw, which is made of Ripe Plantains, which is not unpleasant to the Palate. After they had been treated in this place about an hour, a Message came from his Majesty to invite them to Dinner, which was made ready under another huge Tree,—for Houses there are none ; this being only a place for Summer's Diversion, where they fear no Rain or change of weather for some months.

They found the King Seated on a low Seat, with some few of the Nobility standing about him. After due reverence paid to him, they were commanded to sit down at a little distance from his Majesty, who was at the head of the Table which was made of Twigs most curiously wrought, and covered thick with Plantain Leaves, instead of Cloth and Napkins, and instead of Knives, there was a kind of a Dagger which they use in War, called a Macheat: In the middle of the Table was an Earthen Vessel full of Salt, which is very scarce in the inner Parts of the Country, and another of Pepper, which is very plentiful, and much used in Dressing all their Victuals.

The first course was of flesh meat, which was stewed in very small Pieces in a Pipkin, with Roots and Green Plantains and Bonanos, with a great deal of Pepper, which was stewed too much and poured out into Earthen Dishes; It relished extremely well, and perfumed the whole place.

The next course was for the most Part of the flesh of two sorts of Beasts, called by the Indians Peccary and Warree, which was broyled upon Grid-Irons made of Wood; it was served up without any sawce; but when it came to the Table, one of the waiters strew it all over with Salt and Pepper.

The third and last Course was of Fish, some boiled in Earthen Pipkins with Pepper and Bonanos, and some broyled upon the Indian Grate, called Barbecues.

After all, for a kind of Desert was served in dried Plantains, Bonanos, and a kind of a musk Fig with some Bastard Cinnamon, with which the Country abounds.

Every one had at his right hand, two or three Calabashes of several of the above-mentioned Liquors, to take and drink when he pleased without any Cups, and another of Curious Spring Water.

The King in Eating, dipt his two forefingers of the right hand bent hook-wise, and took up therewith out of the Dish as with a Spoon, as much as he could, stroking it a-cross into his mouth. After every mouthful, he dipt his fingers into the water by his side, for Cleanliness and Coolness, for the meat he eat is excessive hot. He eat no bread with it, but at every three or four mouthfuls he dipt his finger in the salt and strok't over his tongue.

All Dinner-time he was entertained with Musick, Vocal and Instrumental, which seemed to be very diverting to him ; tho' to the guests it seemed harsh and jarring. The subject of it was the great Achievements of himself and Ancestors, and concluded with a Song to welcome the guests.

After Dinner was over, the Deputies withdrew, and were Conducted to the place where they had refreshed themselves after the morning Audience.

CHAPTER VI.

Their Game and Manner of Hunting.

THEY had not been long there, when a Messenger came to them to ask them if they would be pleased to divert themselves with Hunting, for News was brought the King, that a great drove of Peccary was come down the Hills. This Peccary is a kind of a Wild Hog, very black with little short legs, yet runs swiftly. Its Navel is upon the back, and if upon the killing this beast the Navel is not cut away from the carcase within four hours at farthest, it taints all the flesh and makes it stink intollerably ; but if it be taken away, it will keep well several days, and is well tasted and very Nourishing Meat. But to return to our discourse, all things were made ready, the Dogs were brought out, which are small ill-shaped Curs, with rough straggling hair and very slow, so that they rather serve for starting Game, than running it down. The Hunters were all on foot, here being no Horses, had every one his Bow and Arrows, his Lance, and a long knife which they call a Macheat. Being thus accoutred, they set forward, and the Women made frequent Prayers for their success. The King with the Deputies stood upon a Hill, where was an excellent Prospect, and where they saw the whole Hunting without scarce moving a step. With their Men and Dogs and some Nets they had (which are made of a sort of Grass that we called Silk Grass, of which strong thread is spun) they surrounded four or five of them, so that they could not easily escape. They seemed not to value the Dogs, which durst not attack them, but stood barking at them, as it were at Bay. But the Hunters from behind some shrubs, shot them with their Arrows, and they made away with several of them in their Bodies, and run very fast for a while, but the loss of Blood soon stopped their Career. Then they came in with their Dogs and killed them with their Lances in a trice; then they cut them into four quarters immediately, and raised a mighty shout, which was Answered by the King and the People about him; some Playing upon a kind of a Trumpet made of Bambo, and sounded in an unmusical strain the Death of the Peccary. As soon as the Peccarys were brought to the King, he made the Deputies a Present of two of them.

At Night they took leave of the King, and were conducted to the forementioned place of retirement, where were hung several large Hammocks made of Silk Grass, and tied from Tree to Tree. The Night was pleasant and refreshing, and everybody slept as well as if he had been in the best furnished Chamber, there was all round a mighty silence, and the pleasant murmuring of the wind in the tops of the Trees gently moved us to sleep; neither were we troubled with the least fly or insect, which are very troublesome in low swampy ground. But it's not here to be forgot, that a profer was made of some young Women to solace the Deputies, which was modestly refused. Everybody slept soundly till about Sun rising, when we were awaked by a noise of Panawers, of which enough has been said above.

CHAPTER VII.

Of their Return to Fort St Andrew.

AFTER they had dressed and refreshed themselves with some of the Peccary Barbecued, or broyled upon a Wooden Grate, they walked up and down those pleasant Groves, and passed two Days more with almost the same Entertainment and Ceremonies as at first. The third day Early in the Morning they had their Audience of Conge; and several young Boys of the Chief Nobility were recommended to the Deputies to be Educated, and to learn the Scottish Language, who were kindly received by them; who were glad to have so many Pledges for the observation of the Treaty, and which was the greatest mark imaginable of their sincerity, they were reconducted down the Hills with almost the same Ceremonies and Dancings they had at their coming up. All was pleasant and gay, only the Mothers of the young boys made at first a mighty howling and beating of their Breasts; but they were comforted by their Husbands, who told them It would only be for a while, and that the Deputies would send some Boys of their Nation to be trained in their stead.

In our return we met with a sort of Wild Hog, called Warree by the Indians: It is very good Meat; it has little Ears, but very great Tusks, and the Hair or Bristles 'tis covered with are long and thick-Set. It's a fierce Creature, and dreads no beast whatsoever; but one of the Company quickly dispatched it with a Slug shot out of a Fowling Piece. The noise of the Shot roused at the same time a stately horned Buck, who made his escape.

We saw abundance of Rabbits, which are as large as Hares, which have no Tails, but little short Ears, with huge large long Claws. They have no Burroughs, but lodge in the Roots of Trees. Several of them were killed. They are Excellent Meat, and eat much moister than European Rabbits.

We met with whole Drovers of Monkeys, most of them black, some few white ; some with large Beards, others Beardless, which were then fat, the Fruits being ripe, and are very agreeable meat.

We saw many other sorts of Animals, of which a further Account will be given in a particular Treatise, by an ingenious Gentleman who designs the Natural History of these parts. But we neither saw Bullock, Horse, Ass, Sheep, Goats, nor so much as a Cat, tho' they be much troubled with Rats and Mice, so that one may make their Fortunes by Cats, as Whittington did, who was twice or thrice Mayor of London, which confirms that common Tradition of his sudden acquiring of great Riches.

The Countrey we returned thro' was very Woody, only here and there were some pleasant Savanals, where grows great plenty of Maiz, which makes a substantial strong Bread, but it Eats something dryer and harsher than our Wheat. It produces a wonderful increase, above a Thousand for One. The Planting and Gathering of it is the Work of the Women. The men's Employment is only Hunting and Fishing.

There are infinite quantities of Cedar, very high and large. The Wood is very Red, of a curious Grain, and of a very fragrant smell. The only use they make of them is for Canoa's and Periago's ; the first being much less than the second ; which latter sometimes, tho' all of one Tree hollowed, will conveniently carry fifty or threescore men.

There are great store of Plantains which produce an excellent Fruit. The Indians set them in Rows, and they make very delightful Groves.

Bonano's grow here in great plenty : They are a sort of Plantains ; the Fruit is short and thick, sweet and mealy ; it eats excellently well raw, but the Plantain eats best when it's boiled.

But the Crown of all is that Delicious Food which we call the Pine Apple, shaped something like an Artichoak, as big as a man's head. It grows like a Crown on the top of a stalk, about the thickness of an ordinary man's arm, and a Foot and a half high. The Fruit is commonly 7 lbs. weight, inclosed with short prickly Leaves. This Fruit has no Kernal in it. 'Tis very juicy, and seems to taste of all the Delicious Fruits together. It ripens at all times of the Year, and is raised from new Plants. The Leaves of the Plant are broad, about a Foot long, and grow from the Root. Some of the Company would have called it The Vegetable Manna, which would have been no improper name; for it has a thousand Delights in its Taste, and may supply the Defects of all Sort of Fruits. Its Leaves serve for covering of Houses, and Bed-cloaths over the Hammocks. Two or three of them will defend one from the Sun and the Rain.

We saw Sugar-Canes in abundance; but the Indians know not how to make Sugar. They will carry them as they walk, under their Arms, and now and then take a piece of one of them and chew it, and suck out the juice.

Bastard Cinnamon Trees grow in most places, which bear a sort of a Cod something shorter than a Bean-Cod, but much thicker. It's thought if they were transplanted, the Bark might in time be little inferior to the fam'd Cinnamon of Ceilon.

There grows plentifully two sorts of Pepper, the one called Bell-Pepper, the other Bird-Pepper, which are both much used by the Indians. Both sorts grow on a shrubby Bush about a yard high. The Bird-Pepper has the smaller leaf, and is much more esteemed by the Indians and is capable of great improvements.

Red Wood, fit for Dyers, is no less plentiful than the former. The Trees are commonly about 40 Foot high, about the thickness of ones Thigh. The Indians with this, and a kind of Earth, dye Cottons for their Hammocks. It makes a bright lively Red.

The Tobacco that grows here is not so strong as that in Virginia, which we attributed to their want of Skill in managing it; for they raise it onely from Seed, and never transplant it, as they do in all the Tobacco Countries. When it's cured, they strip it from the stalks, and laying 2 or 3 Leaves upon one another, they roll up all together sideways into a long Roll, leaving a little hollow; round this they roll other Leaves, closed hard, till it be as big as one's Wrist, and 2 or 3 foot long. They smoke it in Company thus: A Boy lights one end of the Roll, and burns it to a Coal, wetting the part next it, to keep it from wasting too fast. The end so lighted he puts into his mouth, and blows the smoak thro' the whole length of the Roll into everybody's Face in the Company. Then they sitting in their usual posture upon forms, make with their hands held hollow together, a kind of Funnel round their Mouths and Noses, they snuff it up greedily, and are extreemly pleased, and look on it as the greatest of Refreshments.

These were the most remarkable things we observed in our going and returning, besides great variety of Fowl, which deserves a more particular Account, which is left to the Author of the Natural History, here being no room for such large Accounts.

As soon as we were come within sight of St Andrew's Fort, we all fell down on our knees to give God most hearty thanks for our Success and happy Return, and were presently met by a great part of the Garrison. Never were people so caressed, tears of Joy standing in everybodies eyes; and there was great striving among them about getting the Education of the Indian Boys, who in a short time had most of them learned a great many words of our Language. So that it's not doubted but in a short time they will attain the Perfection of it, as some of our Little ones will do of theirs, who are speedily to be sent to remain with the Indians, according to the Agreement in the League, which it's hoped will prove as advantageous to Scotland, as that made between Charlemain and King Achaisus.

CHAPTER VIII.

Of the Advantages of the scituation of Fort St Andrew, and the Interest of preserving it, and the Dangers that threaten it; With the Conclusion of the History.

THE Spaniards, whom it highly concerns, will do their utmost to disturb us, but unless they be assisted by some other Nation, we have no great Reason to fear them; for the daily confluence from all parts, of great shoals of People, the strength of the Scituation of Fort St Andrew, the League with the Indians, and the frequent Defiles will render it an Enterprise too difficult for them. They made some feeble attempts from St Maria, but we dispatching a few select Men, under the Command of Capt. Montgomery, met them in a Plantain Walk, quickly dispersed them, took above 100 Prisoners, and among the rest their Chief Commander Don Domingo de la Rada, who is yet a prisoner at Fort St Andrew, and will be continued there till we have a Good Account of the Spaniards' treatment of Capt. Pinkarton, who commanding the Dolphin Tender, was forced by distress of Weather under the Walls of Carthagena, and made Prisoner last February, a little before the above mentioned Skirmish happened.

As we grow stronger, we shall endeavour to procure a part in the South Sea, from whence it's not above 6 weeks Sail to Japan and some parts of China; so that, bating distress of weather, by bringing the Commodities of those Countries over this narrow Isthmus, the Riches of those Kingdoms may in 4 or 5 months' time arrive in Europe.

What Interest England has in concurring to the Preservation of this Colony, it's needless to dispute, since they have Arts and Means to share in the Riches of Scotland. And all our Nobility and Gentry must, for their own Interest, attend the Court of England and consequently disperse their money among them. All these Circumstances concurring, makes us hope it will be one of the most thriving Colonies in the World, and that all Attempts against it will prove abortive, which ought to be the wish of all the Inhabitants of Great Britain.
